In that particular parish road building began some eight years ago by the levying of a $500,000 tax, which, after its expenditure, was supplemented by another vote of another $500,000, and the parish is now expending another half million, and they have a complete, durable highway from the Arkansas State line from the north to the south end of the parish, 90 miles, this being on the eastern side. Another completed road runs 45 miles to the north, through the western portion of the parish, and one from the city of Shreveport to the Texas line, 22 miles, and another to the southeast toward the city of Mansfield, 48 miles distant.

The economy in transporting products of the oil country, its heavy machinery, and vast amount of material used in construction has paid a great profit on the investment to the public and enhanced the assessable values in the parish, so that the assessment has increased more than 300 per cent in the last five years, and not a murmur against the cost of this marvelous improvement.

The spirit for public-road building has become intense throughout the entire State. People along the banks of the Mississippi River, who are subject to disastrous floods from breaks in the levees, are convinced that the construction of good roads along the banks of the river means a better insurance against crevasses and overflows, by reason of the fact that a prompt shipment of material to the weak points in the levee where the danger of a break is probable will perhaps save millions of acres from the destructive waters of the mighty river, and the saving of the great crops of sugar, rice, and cotton is worth infinitely more than the comparatively insignificant cost of good-roads construction for a road to be used in case of an emergency.

For more than 30 years the people of Louisiana have cheerfully borne heavy taxes for the building of levees in order to save the appalling losses which from time to time have visited them and destroyed the fruits of the industry and thrift of the people to the value of enormous sums.

In addition to carrying on the ordinary expense of their State government in making great improvements in their public-school system by State and local taxation, the State, from April 20, 1918, to April 20, 1920, expended $4,368,937.26 in the construction of levees.

The people of Louisiana are a great constructive people. They have been schooled by their long warfare with the greatest physical obstructions that ever confronted any people, but with manly hearts they have grappled every great problem which faced them and have successfully achieved a victory which comes only to those who have the enduring virtues of a superior race. And now having been in the vanguard of good-roads construction they are determined to remain at the head of the procession in this absorbing work, which has become nation-wide, and which means to this great country development, prosperity, and security, which will remain and abide with the Nation until the end of time.

RECLASSIFICATION OF POSTAL SALARIES.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, at 4 o'clock the members of the Joint Commission on the Readjustment of Postal Salaries are to meet for the purpose of signing the report and agreeing upon a bill. It is very desirable that the report and the bill accompanying it be presented to the Senate to-day and properly referred; but before the report and the bill are brought to the Senate Chamber the Senate may have taken a recess or adjourned.

I desire, therefore, to ask unanimous consent that if meanwhile, before the report and the bill are presented, the Senate has adjourned or taken a recess, they may be filed and properly referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I desire also to ask unanimous consent that 5,000 additional copies of the report and 1,000 additional copies of the bill be printed for the use of the joint commission. I understand that that will come within the limit of the appropriation allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator asks unanimous consent that if the report comes into the Chamber after the Senate has adjourned or taken a recess——

Mr. STERLING. After adjournment or after a recess, it may be filed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think anything like that has ever been done before, nor do I think we could do it.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that that course has already been taken in the House. They, anticipating the same situation in the House that may arise here, have asked for and obtained unanimous consent in the House, and I thought a similar course might be taken here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Chair suggests that the Senator make his report now and hand it in later.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if this bill is the one that is referred to in the correspondence which all Senators are getting about readjustment of the salaries of postal employees?

Mr. STERLING. That evidently is the very bill.

Mr. KENYON. If we adjourn, there will be no opportunity to act on that bill at this session. I should like to ask the Senator if he feels, in view of that situation, that Congress should adjourn without adjusting the question of the salaries of postal employees?

Mr. STERLING. Hardly. My impression is that the bill will be disposed of during the present week. I believe that it will be. At any rate, that is the hope and the expectation of all the members of the joint commission.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? What is the additional amount of cost that will be devolved upon the Government by this bill?

Mr. STERLING. I can not tell the Senator just now what will be the additional cost. I may say, in a general way, that the increases perhaps will be disappointing to the employees and also, perhaps, disappointing to some of the officials of the Post Office Department. The commission has sought to find the safe middle ground between parsimony on the one side and extravagance on the other side in the salaries provided.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator know what 5,000 additional copies of the report will cost? I ask the question not because they should not be printed, and particularly if they are wanted, but because they must come within the $200 limit by the action of the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. I do not know just what they will cost, save that I asked the printing clerk here on the floor awhile ago, and told him about how many pages I thought would be in the report, and he said he thought it would easily come within the limit allowed.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator, then, will modify his request so as to ask that there shall be 5,000 copies printed, or so many thereof as will come within the limit of cost of $200, I have no objection.

Mr. STERLING. I modify the request accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request as modified is agreed to.

Mr. STERLING subsequently said: By direction of the Joint Commsission on Postal Salaries, authorized by section 3 of an act approved February 28, 1919, making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, I submit the preliminary report on salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service with a view to the reclassification and readjustment of salaries on an equitable basis, accompanied by a bill, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (S. 4475) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that 1,000 additional copies of the bill be printed for the use of the joint commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I understand that there has been a unanimous-consent agreement entered into whereby we are to vote upon the Armenian resolution to-morrow at 4 o'clock. I observe nothing in that agreement which requires that we shall consider the resolution involved continuously until to-morrow. I do not know whether or not there is any Senator present who desires to speak on the subject now. If I thought there were I should not make the motion which I intend to make, but if there is no Senator now ready to speak on the resolution I wish to have the pension bill taken up.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota and also of the Chair to the fact that there is pending a motion to proceed to the consideration of the magnesite tariff bill. Some discussion arose about the matter to which the Senator from North Dakota has referred, as to the parliamentary status of the Armenian resolution, and as to whether or not it could be laid aside upon motion. I made the motion, and it was succeeded by that discussion and by the address which has just been made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. If it is in order, I shall ask to have a vote upon the motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not understand how there could be a pending motion when we are discussing the other matter, which is the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the regular order being Senate concurrent resolution No. 27, upon which it has been agreed to vote at 4 o'clock to-morrow, any motion to take up business at this time would displace that order and would be contrary to the spirit of the agreement. The Chair is of the opinion, however, that by unanimous consent the regular order could be temporarily laid aside and some other matter could be taken up.

Mr. McCUMBER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Could not the same end be accomplished by a motion to temporarily lay the unfinished business aside, the effect of which would be exactly the same, merely the temporary laying aside of the pending business, so that it may be brought up again at any time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that that could not be done; that it would be a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement. If the Senator from North Dakota should ask unanimous consent to lay aside temporarily the unfinished business and to consider the measure he has in mind and it should be granted, then it would be in order to take up his bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will conform to the suggestion of the Chair and ask unanimous consent that the pending measure may be temporarily laid aside for the consideration of Calendar No. 528, being House bill 12530, which is the private omnibus pension bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the regular order be temporarily laid aside, and that the pension bill to which he refers may be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before agreeing to the request, I should like to ask a question. What is the bill which the Senator from North Dakota desires to have taken up?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the omnibus pension bill.

Mr. KENYON. Is it a matter which will take very much time?

Mr. McCUMBER. It will take a little time, I assume, because I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] objects to a number of the cases which are included in the bill; desires a vote upon some of them; and wishes further to discuss others.

I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa, however, that many of the items which are included in the amended omnibus bill are items which have been on the calender since last September. We have not passed any of them during the winter or up to the present time, holding them all in abeyance until the Fuller bill should be passed, and then eliminating from the total number of cases before the Senate all that would be taken care of by the Fuller pension bill.

Mr. KENYON. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but a motion has been filed to reconsider the minimum wage bill, which was passed on Monday last, and I am anxious that that motion shall be disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope that we shall be able to consider the matter referred to by the Senator, and that there will be no objection to taking up the pension bill at this time, unless some Senator may desire to speak at the present time upon the pending measure. In that event I should not, of course, urge the consideration of the pension bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not object to the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to proceed with the consideration of the pension bill. By that I do not mean to say that I assent to the passage of the bill, and I am speaking now merely for the purpose of combating a statement made by the Senator, or at least the inference to be deduced therefrom, that the Senator from Utah objected to some of the claims contained in the bill for which the Senator from North Dakota asks consideration. I object to substantially all of the items of appropriation in that bill, carrying 600 or 700 private pension claims. I shall not ask for a vote, as I stated to the Senator the other day, upon all of the items, but only upon two or three groups, and I shall probably desire to discuss, not each item—for if I should undertake to do that it would take several days—but some of the items in each group, and to call the attention of the Senate to them. It will probably take some little time, however, to discuss the various items to which I desire to call attention.

If the Senator will pardon me, however, I should like the Senator to yield, if he will, to enable the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], if he desires, to call up for immediate consideration and passage the bill to which he called the attention of the Senate a few days ago and to which I then objected. I objected to the consideration of the measure because it was entirely new, I was not familiar with its terms, and, as I gathered from him, the bill contained provisions different from what upon an examination of the bill I found were contained in it. After examining the measure, I desire to say that I think it is meritorious, and I shall be glad to do anything I can to aid the Senator from Washington in securing its consideration and passage. I will add that I do not refer to the magnesite bill, but to the bill for the relief of soldiers enlisted for service in Siberia.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is no objection to doing so, the bill to which the Senator from Utah refers may be taken up at any time, but I should like at least to call up the bill to which I refer and get the legislation started in order that the Senator may present his objections. I think he told me the other day he would probably take half an hour in discussing the matter; but I should like to have the bill considered and disposed of, if possible, for it covers a great many cases and many of the individuals who are affected by it are in indigent circumstances and are very old and feeble. I think we ought to put the bill through at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question. The cases included in the bill of which he is in charge are not covered, as I understand, by the general pension bill recently passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. They are cases that would not be covered by the general pension legislation; they are cases of an extreme and necessitous character.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What is the total carried by the bill for the special cases?

Mr. McCUMBER. The total appropriation, I think, will amount to about $148,000, provided the recipients of the benefits under the bill live a year.

Mr. WARREN. Some of them have died while the bill has been pending.

Mr. McCUMBER. But experience indicates that probably half of them will pass away during the year; and the added expense to the Government would really be nothing, because, taking the number of deaths of beneficiaries of special bills in a single year, the amount saved is very much more than the amount that has ever been granted in any year under special pension acts.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Am I correct in my impression that a great many of the special cases which were heretofore on the calendar were taken care of under the general pension bill recently enacted by Congress?

Mr. McCUMBER. Three-fourths of them were taken care of in that legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall make no objection, but I hope the Senator will follow it up by calling for the consideration of the bill which is designed to pension some of the regular soldiers and officers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I certainly intend to do so.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12530) granting pensions and increases of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to take this occasion, since I do not know when I may have another opportunity, to call the attention of the Senate to a condition existing throughout the country of which I am sure the Members of this body are not fully appreciative.

The so-called high cost of living has had such an effect upon the people of this country that I am sure they have not properly analyzed just what are its causes, and, not having the conditions of the problem clearly defined in their minds, they are not prepared to apply the proper solution.

It is needless for me to refer to the unprecedented influx of gold into this country, antedating our entrance into the war but immediately subsequent to the outbreak of the World War. We were in a position at that time to furnish in larger measure than any other nation, perhaps, the great necessities of the world to meet the conflict that was then raging. It was not so much a question of the price that these articles would cost as a question of getting the articles; so that the resources of the nations involved in this conflict were strained to their utmost and gold poured into America in exchange for the things that were essential to the prosecution of the war.

That there was profiteering at the expense of our European friends goes without saying. When it was known that it was a question of getting the material rather than the price of the material, when the issues of life and death, nationally speaking, were at stake, no time was left for bargaining. It was simply a question of time and not a question of cost. The consequence was that an unfortunate condition was precipitated by circumstances over which it seemed that no one had control. Labor was to be enticed to enter into the production of these things wanted abroad.

Fabulous prices, as compared with the wages they had previously received, were offered. Every vocation and avocation that employed manual labor was stripped to the bone, and these great war enterprises were fostered in order to supply the needs of those in dire distress abroad.

This went on for more than two years, prices mounting because the things that were needed for war were the basis of the things needed in the ordinary commercial pursuits in this country. Then, when we entered the war the same necessity gripped us, because the war in Europe had gone on for so long a time that those who were our allies were bled white, and when we entered the war it was only a question of time and not a question of expense. The consequence was that we entered under the same conditions that Europe had found herself, and prices mounted and mounted, and the very basis of living in this country was jeopardized, because from forest and field and factory were drafted those who were supplying the necessaries of life to the population of this country and put into the production of those things that were essential to meet the crisis impending in Europe. It is true that under the new banking and currency law every pound of available wealth, every yard, every system of measuring wealth in this country, was met adequately by our flexible system of banking and currency, so that the whole wealth of this country was mobilized under these high prices in order to carry on the war.

Now, Mr. President, the war is past. Prices for the necessaries of life have risen from two prime causes—one, the unprecedented demand for labor at these exorbitant prices and the other the consequent scarcity of the necessities of life, caused both by the season and by the drafting of the producers into the war.

Here we are now; the armistice has been declared and the high cost of living is still at its peak. Profiteering has been charged, and doubtless has gone on, but it has been more universal than those who speak of profiteering have cared to define or have defined. From the bootblack on the street corner to the most intricate form of manufacture things have risen pari passu, so that it is a question of a higher plane of prices universally. It did not happen just in a minute, because when the demand was made for labor, and the wage of the laborer rose, the thing that the laborer produced rose, and the consequence was that that which he produced in every department went up comparatively with it, so that the purchasing power of the dollar, as has been said, was cut half in two, and the shoe black who had been living on his nickel a shine found that he either had to charge a dime or go on half rations, and he charged the dime. The man who has been working for $100 a month and buying a $50 suit found that when he went with his $100 he had to do without a suit, and he must of necessity get more for his time; and, outside of a few salaried men, there was a relative rise, so that in the division of the circulating wealth that we had there was no very exceptional condition. The multimillionaire and those that were farthest removed from him just had their relative positions changed in the mounting prices.

Now, the war is over. The armistice has been declared. There is no crisis confronting us, no urgent demand for the production of anything, save one thing, and that is the bread and meat of this country. We have sufficient of manufactures to tide us over the period of reconstruction. Men can patch their old suits and patch their old shoes and make them do another day or another year, but they can not patch their breakfast and dinner and make them do for the morrow; and the cry of this country now is for the necessities of human food.

What is the condition that now confronts us? Our banking people, the Federal reserve people, seem to think that at this time it is incumbent upon them—and it doubtless is—to join in this great warfare against high prices. Now, every man in this country knows that when everything is said and done the development of this country and its prosperity depend fundamentally upon credit, and credit depends entirely upon the system by which the credit is granted and sustained. Therefore, whoever has charge of the management and the manipulation of the currency of this country has charge of its development and prosperity.

We were all proud of the fact that we had passed a law that met the stupendous strain of a World War, that financed America without impeding its progress and development domestically, that financed Europe, and during the period of that war the failures of the national banks of this country rapidly decreased until in 1919, when our banking system was put to the severest test to which a banking system could be put, there was not a single national bank failure in America involving a dollar's loss to a depositor. In addition to that, the Federal Reserve System during this period not only gradually decreased the number of bank failures, but it was the basis upon which the bank resources of this country have increased an average of over 600 per cent.

In addition to that, not only had they increased 600 per cent, but the Federal Reserve System itself, according to the best information I can get, made 108 per cent profit.

As I said, we are confronted with a condition unparalleled in the history of this country, so far as bread and meat are concerned. I interrogated the Secretary of Agriculture to know what was the supply of labor this year as compared with last year, and his reply to me was that it was 72 per cent of normal, numerically speaking, but as to its efficiency it was impossible to tell, in that those who were left to produce the agricultural products of this country were largely women and children and old men.

Of course, young, vigorous men, who heretofore have tilled the farms, are not going to stay on the farms under the conditions which now confront us. Why should they? They, like some of us, have mistaken plenty of money for wealth, and the possibility of obtaining with ease the necessaries of life. But we are rapidly approaching the place where we will find out that wealth counted in gold and silver and in circulating money does not mean bread and meat, or the other necessaries of life.

Young, vigorous men, with scarcely any training at all, in the towns and villages and cities of this country, can command six and seven and eight and nine dollars a day, working eight hours a day, and is it to be thought that any man, governed by common sense, is going to forego that and go to a farm where the highest return is scarcely half that, if half, and then, when he has labored from 12 to 14 hours a day at half the pay he could get elsewhere, depend upon the other man for the price of the thing he produces? Is it any wonder that our farms are left tenantless, that our fields are left uncultivated, by the thrifty, the young, the enterprising, when eight hours a day and from six to eight dollars a day is beckoning to him?

Which one of us here to-day, charged with the duty of legislating when necessary, and providing means when necessary to avert a calamity which is impending, or if we have not the legislative power, agreeing to call attention to it—which one of us would advise a young man to-day to go and engage in agricultural pursuits, at $2.50 or $3 a day, or, if he is running it on his own responsibility, to incur now an indebtedness for high-priced implements to work his farm, for high-priced fertilizer to fertilize his farm, for high-priced labor to aid in cultivating his farm, and then have to wait six long months before he gets a commercial asset to meet the liabilities, then to take the proceeds, after the investment of his money in these high-priced articles, and put them on the market at the say-so of the other man? The consequence is that our agricultural labor is absolutely decimated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator is discussing a very practical question, and he puts his finger on the trouble, in my opinion—that it can not be expected that agricultural products will reduce in price, or even stay where they are, if men in other lines of employment are paid double and treble what the worker on the farm is paid. Yet, if the job on the farm is made attractive enough to induce people to abandon the industries in which they are paid three or four times what they are paid on the farm, how can the owner of the farm, and the employer of farm labor at those trebled prices, hope to reduce the price of his product?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is the very point I am coming to now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand. I have simply amplified a little the subject the Senator was discussing. I am waiting in anxious anticipation, and I know I can greatly profit by listening to the Senator's remedy for this condition.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly the remedy is not the one which is being applied now. I said in an interview which I gave out to the press several months ago that I knew that if the patriotism of certain individuals could be appealed to—which I knew was idle to ask—if those engaged in nonessential manufacture or production, those who are engaged in the manufacture of things which are not absolutely essential, could be induced to desist, and if they could not, then if our banking and currency law were of such a form—and after reading and studying it, it seemed to me that it was in a manner amenable to that construction—there should be a restriction of accommodation to such enterprises.

But in applying what they consider the power they have, they have absolutely intensified the condition under which we are now laboring.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator is now, I presume, referring to the order of the Federal Reserve Board increasing the discount rate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; that is what I am coming to now.

Mr. NORRIS. I am laboring still under the impression that under section 4 of the Federal reserve act the Federal Reserve Board had it within their power to issue an order which would go down and even reach the member bank, to discriminate in the kinds of credit it could extend. For instance, it could say to a member bank, "You will not be entitled to rediscount your paper here if you are extending credit to speculators. It is your duty to extend credit," let us say, "to those who are producing food, and your duty to refuse credit, or at least any additional credit, and draw down a little of what you have extended to those who are engaging in nonessential business and who want the money for nonessential things." Does the Senator agree with me?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If they have that power, then it seems to me that if they would exercise it, to a great extent it would remedy the condition, would it not?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was my impression.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I would like to relate an actual interview I had with a farmer on this very point. A man whom I have known for nearly 20 years, who was operating quite a large farm, engaged in the raising of wheat and corn and hogs and cattle, in a locality where it is necessary to use a great deal of fertilizer, came into my office a few weeks ago and was talking about the situation, and about this order of the Federal Reserve Board.

He told me that several weeks ago he went to his bank and tried to borrow $500 for the purpose of buying fertilizer, which the Senator will realize is one of the things the farmers have to do now, and they have to wait until their crop is marketed before they pay for it.

It is a credit which is very common at this time of the year where they use fertilizer, and it is very desirable for the good of the whole country that it should be extended. Notwithstanding the fact that the banker said the farmer was good, and I know personally that he was perfectly good, they declined to allow him anything, and told him that on account of the Federal reserve efforts to curtail loans and draw in and contract in all directions they could not let him have anything.

He was a little suspicious of it, felt that it was not quite right; he wanted to try it out and test the program. So he drove around to an automobile dealer in the same town, whom he knew very well and who knew him very well, and he said to the automobile man, "My automobile is getting old and I ought to get a new automobile. I would like to talk with you about it."

The automobile man said, "All right." He showed him an automobile, looked his old machine over, and told him how much he would allow him for it. Then the farmer said to him, "Well, I have not got the cash. I will have to wait until I harvest my crop in reality, so that I would have to buy it on time." The automobile man said, "That is all right. Your note is perfectly good. Give me your note and take out the new machine."

Then he said to the dealer, "Do you do that with everybody?" He said, "I do that with everybody who is good. I recognize that your note is good, and I do that with anyone whose note is as good as yours." The farmer said, "Are you able to carry all of us who want new automobiles?"

He said, "Oh, no; I could not carry any of you, but I will take your note to the bank as soon as I get it and get cash on it."

Of course, in reality the farmer did not want to buy an automobile, and he left the dealer; but he concluded, and it seems to me he reached the logical conclusion, that in some way, somewhere, this was worked so that if a man wanted to borrow money for the purpose of increasing production and helping to decrease the cost of living he could not get it, but if he wanted to buy something which was manufactured and handled and owned by a business man, if he wanted to buy a new automobile for a joy ride, he could get all the money he wanted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, every man here knows that the most timid thing in the world is money, and everybody knows that when the Federal Reserve Board sent out notice that the banks must retrench they knew who would have to retrench. When they were required to reduce their line of credit, everything moving along the line of least resistance, whose line of credit would they first reduce?

Mr. NORRIS. Now, let me interrupt the Senator further with this illustration. Is there any doubt, in the judgment of the Senator, that under the law as it stands now they could have issued an order so that the banker would have run the risk of not being able to get any credit if he loaned to the man who wanted to buy an automobile, but would have no difficulty whatever in rediscounting his paper if he loaned to a man who wanted to buy fertilizer?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think not, Mr. President. The fact of the business is this, that in the attempt to lower the cost of living they have done two things, one to raise the rate of interest, so as to make borrowing as unenticing as possible; and the other is to absolutely refuse loans, as they say, on certain characters of business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I might recite an experience I myself had the other day with a loan in New York, which does not altogether substantiate the fact that this is the only class of loans which are being denied.

I will say to the Senator that I indorsed the note of a certain business man—a thing which I do not do very often—for $56,000. The other day the note fell due, and there was no extension on any part of it. It had to be paid that day, no matter what sacrifices might have to be made, and it was paid. These calls of loans are not only made in the case of the farmer, but every business man in the United States is suffering from the calling of loans now. When you see advertisements in the papers of a cut of from 25 to 33⅓ per cent in prices in order to induce the purchase of merchandise, you may put it down immediately that it is because loans held by the merchants have been called by the banks. There is an extension of credit beyond what they claim they ought to give.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The purpose for which I call the attention of the Senate to this matter is that it does seem to me that this body of men do not clearly differentiate between artificial production and natural production. The artificial producer is a manufacturer. He has control of his seasons, he has control of his output. At the end of every 12 or 24 hours he has a commercial asset to meet his commercial liabilities in producing that asset. If danger threatens his business, he can instantly begin to retrench; he can gauge the crop he is going to produce to the pound or the yard, and the quality of it, and he can control the price of it; while the natural producer, the man who furnishes your table and mine with the bread and meat that we eat, must assume for six months liabilities that he is morally and legally bound to meet and then depend upon conditions outside of himself and beyond his control as to the quality and the quantity of the thing that he produces. In addition to that he has no voice in the price of the product.

So that in the spring, when he has contracted for all his high-priced fertilizer, all his high-priced implements to cultivate his farm, when he has contracted for his high-priced labor to help cultivate it, he has assumed a liability that he must meet, while over the assets that he produces he has no control with reference either to quantity or quality or price.

Now, in this day of readjustment, in the spring of 1920, the farmers of this country are called upon to produce foodstuffs to meet the fearful shortage not only in America but in the world. What is happening right now? I have a letter in my pocket that I wish to read, which will give some intimation as to the condition of affairs. It is from one of the best farmers in my State. I read:

MY DEAR SENATOR: You are probably familiar with the action of the Federal Reserve Board in shutting off loans and refusing to rediscount paper for the national banks. This situation will prove quite embarrassing to farmers and others as well who are depending on the banks for money to buy supplies and pay for labor. Our labor is already short and demanding high wages, and we can not hope to hold them unless we are able to pay them promptly for their work. If there is any way for us to get around the present emergency, I would thank you to suggest it, as I know quite a good many farmers who are greatly embarrassed by the present situation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I understand the letter which the Senator has just read, the complaint seems to be that the Federal Reserve Board, if it has not discriminated in the discounting of paper, at least has refused to encourage the making of loans to farmers and has refused to take farmers' paper when transmitted by the member bank making the loan upon that paper.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think in order to be fair to the Federal reserve bank——

Mr. KING. I wish to know if that is being done.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I think it is not. The Federal reserve bank in its zeal to deflate—and if I had the time this afternoon I should like to discuss the misnomer of what we call inflation—in order to bring about deflation and in order to lower the cost of living, is desirous that the productive elements in the country shall receive all the assistance that they can while the nonessentials and nonproductive industries shall be curtailed. But when they send out a blanket request that the banks of the country shall retrench and shall lessen their lines of credit, the banks are going to use their discretion, and it is not likely if Mr. A. is engaged in a nonessential production and has vast wealth and vast resources and has kept a big balance in the bank from year to year that he is going to be called upon to remove his note in this emergency, while the farmer who has no resources save the little crop that he may have on hand or the prospect of making one will be the first man to feel this tightening of credit.

It is for that reason that I am making this plea. A banker down in my State who is required to retrench necessarily looks around to see where he can do it with the greatest amount of thrift to himself, and the consequence is that he eliminates those lines of credit that to him are not gilt-edged and better for him as a banker.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. When would the Senator have the deflation begin? To what time would he postpone it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would not postpone deflation at all, but I would certainly have an absolute unmistakable utterance from the Federal Reserve Board and some practical method suggested by them by which deflation would be taken along lines that would not jeopardize the fullest production of the necessaries of life in this country. I think they are like Paul said about the Jews. I think they use the zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. They ought to have some plan and put into operation some plan that would absolutely be practicable in retrenching along lines that would not reflect disastrously in the matter of production.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely. I am agreed with the Senator. Along what line would he have them proceed?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. They seem to have the power under section 4 and under an amendment which was placed on the Federal reserve law some six weeks or two months ago. I think the Senator will recall the amendment. I intended to have something to say about that amendment, how in its very workings, if applied to any considerable section, it would result disastrously on notes, drafts, or bills issued for agricultural purposes, because right now in the spring, when farmers want to pay off in cash—and you can not get your help on credit, but Saturday night you must pay, and you must meet your cash payments for fertilizers and implements, and you must discount your notes in order to get that cash—what is going to be the result if, in this general deflation, the bank says, "Our line of credit is exhausted and we are called upon to retrench, and we can not accommodate you." Then what about production in this country?

Mr. McCORMICK. Do I understand the Senator, then, to agree that the Reserve Board should exercise its influence to induce a restriction of credits now employed in the production of things not necessary to the life of the country and its people?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do; and then get a practical rule by which, in trying to do that, they do not destroy the essential production of the country.

Mr. McCORMICK. Then, does not the Senator believe that the conference held by the Reserve Board some two weeks ago ought to have been held some three months ago, in order to mobolize the credits to move the crops this year?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to state that the thing that alarms me now is this. My attention was called to this illustration, as it was an actual case in hand:

A merchant in a little village, my home, had contracted for supplies for the farmers. The tobacco crop will soon be moving. He wanted to lay in a supply against the harvesting and sale of the tobacco crop. He went to the bank to get his note discounted to meet the payments, the 30 or 60 day discounts, and he could not get a penny. The farmers were diversifying, under the advice of the Agricultural Department, in order to meet the ravages of the boll weevil in the planting of tobacco. Here is this merchant prepared to help them in food and in sustaining their needs in the way of extending credit, but when he goes to the bank he can not get a penny. Why?

It was because the psychological effect of this move to restrict panics is sweeping the country, and the most timid thing in commercial life is the cash, and when there is the least danger of its power being restricted it seeks cover. The Federal Reserve Board should see to it that there is issued not only a request, but they should work out some plan by which the banks of the country will be encouraged to lend as liberally as possible to the producers of the country at the lowest possible rate of interest.

The men upon whom we are depending to feed and clothe the country are the men who know the least about banking and have the least credit. Unless we give them to understand now in the spring of 1920 that the high cost of the fertilizer which they buy, the high cost of wages that they have paid, the high cost of the implements that they have to buy will be taken care of as nearly as can be by the banks extending them loans, we need not be surprised if the farmer retrenches and says, "I will only plant so much as will take care of me and mine." He is a human being.

What kind of a business man would you call him if in this springtime he were to buy all that is necessary in order to produce his crop and compete in the market for labor to gather that crop, and then under this impulse and drive of the banking institutions of the country to drive things down he would know that in the fall, when he goes to capitalize his assets to repay for these things bought at the peak, that he may be left, as he has heretofore been left, with the privilege of going back and making another crop without any profit?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I was talking with a banker some weeks ago, and he stated that credit was being denied to agriculturists where it ought to be extended, and he insisted that the agriculturists of the United States had been so prosperous that ninety-nine out of every hundred of them needed no loans from banks in order to finance their operations or to aid them in planting or removing their crops. I should like to ask the Senator, because he is familiar with agricultural conditions in the United States, as much, perhaps, as any man in the Senate, whether or not that condition described by that banker is correct?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No.

Mr. KING. Or whether or not their condition is such that they need credit now and need money from the banks in order to carry on their usual spring operations?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Why, that answers itself. There may be here and there one or two who have sufficient to take care of themselves, but the great rank and file of the farmers to-day feel like they are rich because they have been able to pay themselves one time out of debt, but they have nothing ahead.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: There goes out an order from the bank that we must retrench in all lines, and a merchant is called and he has to meet his 30 or 60 day paper and therefore can not get the discount. What does he do?

Every Senator here knows that practically all other business outside of agriculture is organized—perhaps not all but the bulk of it is organized. So whenever a merchant loses on a bill of goods he charges that loss on to the next bill, and thus recoups himself. Whenever you raise the interest to 7 per cent, when a merchant has been paying 5 per cent, he charges the extra 2 per cent on the shirt which he sells you and the shoes which he sells me. If there comes a loss to him by virtue of some one stealing something from him, he has the privilege of distributing it here and there over his goods, and so recoups himself for the loss. From what can the farmer recoup when he incurs a loss? It is impossible and impracticable for him, particularly so far as the great staple crops of the country are concerned, to fix the price of the product which he sells. If he could do so, I should not be on the floor of the Senate this afternoon pleading for the people who feed and clothe this country. They have no power to control the prices of that which we eat and that which we wear, which they produce.

When a bank raises the rate of interest, when the manipulator of the prices of his product puts those prices down, where does he recoup? He recoups by taking his children out of school, and thereby increasing the illiteracy of the country; he recoups by taking the conveniences out of his home and foregoing those things which make civilized life pleasant and happy; he recoups by taking up the burden of poverty and ignorance, and going back once again to mother earth to produce more bread and more meat, more food for the people.

The time is coming—I hope and trust that it is here now—when the agriculturists of this country shall demand a square deal in this important matter. When the rate of interest is raised, do you suppose the merchant is going to lose anything by it? How long would he stay in business if he did? Do you suppose the banker is going to lose anything by it? How long would he be in the banking business if he did so? Do you suppose the wholesaler, the retailer, or the jobber is going to lose one penny by it? They each charge it up in the price of the article which they have to sell, in the shape of money or merchandise, while the producer of the raw material is the man from whom it is ultimately extracted. Hence to-day, with every vocation and avocation save agriculture overrun with labor and paying labor fabulous prices, the farmer is unable to secure labor with which to cultivate the fields of America, although upon his activity and industry our prosperity depends.

Mr. President, I am standing here this afternoon to say that the last amendment which we passed to the banking and currency law giving the Federal Reserve Board the power to restrict the amount of paper which a member bank may discount to a percentage of the capital and surplus of that bank, and when that percentage is exhausted then to gradually increase the rate of interest, will operate, as it is now operating, to restrict the necessary credit and capital necessary to the industrial and agricultural centers of the country, and, in my opinion, will work a disaster that can not be calculated.

Under the law as heretofore administered a member bank was not restricted to its capital and surplus, but if it accepted a certain kind of paper it could accommodate those who were developing agriculture and the necessary industries almost without limit. Now, under the amendment of the law every bank can, with the approval of the board, be restricted, so far as credits are concerned, to an amount equal to its capital and surplus, and when it has gone beyond that be subjected to a progressive and graduated tax that may make a loan prohibitive.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. KING. It is some time since I looked at the figures which show the number of State banks and private institutions that are in operation and the number of banks that belong to the Federal Reserve System, but my recollection is that the number of banks connected with the Federal Reserve System greatly exceed all other banks and organizations engaged in the loaning of money. What I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina is whether or not the action of the Federal Reserve Board in restricting loans, particularly as their action affects the agricultural interests, will not lead to an increase in the number of State banks?

Furthermore, I should like to ask the Senator whether or not, in view of the action of the Federal Reserve Board, State banks are not attempting more and more to care for their agricultural customers? Does the Senator know to what extent State banks are caring for such customers and whether or not their resources enable them to meet, or substantially to meet, the imperative needs of the agriculturists of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I will state, Mr. President, that if the policy which is being at present pursued by the Federal Reserve Board were to continue, I think it would mean the decimation of the system; that the member banks would withdraw from the system, because the enticement heretofore which has called such banks into the Federal Reserve System, in my opinion, has been the privilege of almost unlimited credit, or at least credit limited to the general resources of the entire system and not to the particular member bank. If their borrowing capacity and their banking capacity are going to be limited to their capital and surplus, what inducement is there for them to enter the system? Why should they not stay out of it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not also true, certainly in the South, that in the rural sections the State banks are not large banks?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And that they depend, in great measure, upon the national banks of the cities to loan them money; so when you cut off the supply of the large national banks of the cities you have taken away from the small State banks their power of making loans?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Furthermore this is true: Many such banks before the inauguration of the present Federal banking and currency system had associations with banks in New York City and other large centers from which they borrowed, but since the inauguration of this system they have borrowed from the national banks in their own principal cities; they have given up their arrangements with the eastern centers, and are not borrowing there; and now this cutting off of the national banks throughout the country, especially outside of the great centers, will take away from the banks in the rural sections almost their entire opportunity of obtaining credit and advancing the necessary funds to their rural constituents.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. One of the characteristic differences, one that is fundamental and should be maintained between the present system and the old system, is the decentralizing and liberalizing of loans and credits. Under the old system the commerce of the country was largely dependent upon the impulse and caprice of a few leading bankers in one great city. Whenever they saw fit to extend a loan it could be extended; at what rate of interest was left to their sweet will. Under the Federal reserve law we attempted and succeeded in getting an impartial body of men who had no interest save the development of the resources of the Nation along safe lines, and gave them the power to determine what should be the character of the paper that should be hypothecated for the issuance of Federal reserve notes. The country responded in a manner that is startling.

I have here in my desk a report from the Comptroller of the Currency, which shows that within the seven years of the operation of the Federal reserve banks the banking resources of the national banks of the South increased 900 per cent, their resources having increased $590,000,000 more than they increased from 1863 to 1913. The banking resources of the national banks on the western coast within the seven-year period increased 1,300 per cent, while the resources of the New England banks increased 108 per cent, those of the Northern States 300 per cent, and those of the Middle West 300 per cent, proving conclusively to the student of economics that under the old inflexible banking and currency system the great cities of the North and East, having the capital of this country in their hands and selling money, had exhausted the resources of the other sections, so that when money was decentralized, the basis of credit changed, and the actual wealth of the country and not bonds and gold became the basis of a circulating medium, those sections whose development had been arrested by virtue of the lack of a flexible system responded marvelously to the new impulse.

The South with her enormous resources, but with no capital by which she could put them into operation, responded nine times over; the far West, new, undeveloped, and liberated from the thraldom of the money kings, responded to the extent of 1,300 per cent; but in the eastern section, where they had bartered and sold the lifeblood of the United States, the banking resources only responded to the extent of 108 per cent; proving that this very system has developed this country beyond the dreams of those who framed it.

Now, when the test is on, when the country is crying for bread and for meat, when the fields are being left fallow, is it wisdom on our part so to administer the law as to put us practically in the same position as we were under the old law of 1863 and put into the hands of a few men the power to say to one, "come," and he cometh, and to another, "go," and he goeth; and to one section of the country "prosper," and allow another section to dwindle and die for the want of the life-giving blood of money?

I am pleading here to-day for that class of people who can not influence the banking jugglers except by the soup house and the free kitchen, and, by the help of God, they will influence them; their time is coming.

Mr. KING and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from North Dakota desire to ask a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Admitting everything the Senator has said to be true, what on earth has that got to do with the case of—

Laura A. Moorhead, widow of Samuel Moorhead, late of Seventh Battery New York Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would rather pension the poor devil that is out on the farm, making bread and meat for the American people to eat at this time, than to pension some one who happens to be the beneficiary of a soldier.

Mr. McCUMBER. So would I; but I think we would do more for him if we would get through with the bill that is before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I just want to state to the Senator that, in my opinion, this is a matter of such prime importance that I felt that I should be derelict in my duty if I sat silent when I heard and read these appeals for help that are being made every day. There is no legislation that I know of that we can pass; but we can at least let the country know that we do appreciate the cry for help of those upon whose shoulders rests the feeding and the clothing of this great country, and we ought to serve notice on the bankers of this country that we demand that every legitimate credit shall be extended to those who produce the agricultural products of this country, so as to enable them to maintain a price that will educate their children, put carpets on their floors and pictures on their walls, and let them know that the country that eats their food at least appreciates the source from which its bread and meat come. That is the plea I am making.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator whether or not, in his opinion, in the administration of the law, the Federal Reserve Board would have the right to discriminate in favor of a section or a class where the material welfare of such section or such class is inseparably bound up with the welfare and prosperity of the entire people; or is the rule so ironclad and so inflexible that they must place every victim upon the same bed, Procrustean in character, and cut him off if he is too long or lengthen him if he is too short? What is their discretionary power with a view to advancing the real and substantial welfare of the people and of the country?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is unlimited. The bill to which I refer, and especially the last amendment that was passed, to which I objected and still object, gives them the power to fix the normal rate, as they call it, so low that when they progress and graduate the tax from time to time, before it became prohibitive, the bank would have borrowed maybe two or three times its capital and surplus; but I am informed that in some States, in one State in particular, they have fixed the normal rate at the usury rate in that State, so that, if that be true, they can not discount a dollar's worth of paper.

Mr. President, I want there to be no misunderstanding of the position I have taken this afternoon. To sum it up, I believe that the producers of the necessities of life in this country should be given to understand by the Government now, as far as it can do it in accordance with the genius of our Government, and by the bankers and financiers of this country, that they will be protected in every legitimate way so as to insure their receiving a profitable return for that sine qua non, the bread and meat of this country and the clothes of this country, and that though retrenchment and deflation may be necessary, that retrenchment and deflation shall be along those lines that will help the producer rather than hurt him; that the line of cleavage shall be clearly made between the essential and the nonessential, and that the most important fact should not be lost sight of that he, having incurred obligations at the very height of the market, shall be given the privilege of disposing of this crop at a price that will at least give him a reasonable profit.

The producer has no place upon which to charge off his loss and recoup himself. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] asked me if he went into the market and competed and paid these high prices, and he was protected in getting a profit on them, when might we ever hope for the prices to come down? I answer him that the present crop has already been pitched upon the peak of high prices, and, so far as the raw material is concerned, the American people may not and should not expect any reduction in the cost of the raw material produced this year; but if the proper care is taken when another spring comes on and another crop is projected, then, with the lowering of the price of those things that the producer must have, he can lower pari passu the things that he produces under those conditions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I know that the Senator did not intend to misquote me, but I think he drew a wrong inference from what I said some time ago. What I asked was, if agricultural labor on the farm was increased in its wage so as to make the position attractive as against that of the city laborer, who was paid three times as much, how a reduction in agricultural prices would ever come about?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is a different proposition. Of course it could never come under those conditions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not intend to criticize the Senator at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I understand thoroughly, because I think the Senator from Connecticut, together with all other Senators in this Chamber, realizes the peculiar disadvantage at which the producers of the raw materials—the farmers—are at this particular time. The putting out of a general statement that we must curtail our loans without emphasizing and putting into operation a rule by which that curtailment shall not affect production is affecting it. It is affecting it disastrously.

Farmers are to-day wondering what is to become of them, having incurred this vast volume of debt, if the banks refuse credit and they are not enabled to distribute their production over a period of time which will enable them to get the best market price, but must be forced to put their stuff on the market to meet the obligations incurred in producing it. Any rational man who has a family to support will not take any such chance.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator what ought to be done in order to meet an exigency such as that to which I will call his attention?

I received this morning a telegram from some of the wool-growers of the West. As the Senator knows, they have produced their wool crop, to use his expression, at the peak of high prices. Labor has been high. All of the products and commodities utilized in the production of the wool have been exceedingly high. They have been compelled to borrow to carry their sheep over and to carry on their business during the winter months until they realized from the sale of their wool and the sale of their lambs in the spring.

The banks now are denying them credit, or at least they are curtailing the credit to such an extent that they are greatly embarrassed, and the wool buyers in the East decline to make advances, because they contend that their capacity to borrow is restricted. The result of it is that these woolen men—and the same applies to the cattlemen—are going to meet with serious financial losses unless something is done immediately to ameliorate the condition and to afford them relief. Can the Senator suggest some policy to be pursued by the Government or by the banks which will prevent this great catastrophe which threatens to overwhelm an industry so important to the development and the prosperity of the country?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think that the cattle growers and the wheat growers should be given to understand now that no such condition as the Senator has described would be tolerated a minute, and that the credit subtracted from a nonessential would be immediately placed at their disposal, to give them encouragement to go on with the production of meat and clothing for this country.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, I believe that the Federal Reserve System is trying to do its part to bring about a normal condition. As I heard one illustrate it, if you want to lower a house you can put jackscrews under it and let it go down gradually and in a proper manner, and you still have your house when you have it lowered. But if you attempt to lower it from the top with a sledge hammer you can lower it all right, but when you get it lowered you have not any house.

You are not going to deflate the currency in any radical manner or by the autocratic will of any set of men. You have to deflate the currency as the law of supply and demand and the delicate adjustment of commerce indicates you can do it safely. A false principle wrought into our life is going to work itself out in disaster, and no wholesale order from any man or set of men can do other than jeopardize the welfare of this country or plunge us into a panic. I am pleading for those who are going to be the first affected, those whose failure will first affect us.

In conclusion, I repeat, that we may not be mistaken, we should not mistake a plethora of money for a plethora of wealth. The two are as widely different as a gold dollar is from a biscuit. When there are plenty of biscuits you can buy them with a gold dollar, but you can not, when you have not any biscuits, eat the gold dollar.

So that wisdom would teach us to make just as much of the necessities of life with the agency of the dollar as possible, so that it will be as it is intended to be, a simple representative of wealth, and not make the mistake of considering that it is wealth.

Mr. President, I have said about all I care to say this afternoon on this question. I want the financial interests of this country to give the producers of the country to understand that in the midst of this, the most wonderful financial prosperity this country has ever seen, those who produce the necessaries of life shall be amply taken care of and be given priority in every loan which is essential for their welfare.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Keyes	Phelan	Sutherland
Brandegee	McCumber	Phipps	Thomas
Chamberlain	McNary	Sheppard	Underwood
Dial	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Edge	New	Smith, Md.
Gerry	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. ROBINSON, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts answered to their names when called.

Mr. CALDER, Mr. CAPPER, Mr. KING, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN, Mr. REED, Mr. COLT, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendment reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The reading of the amendment was continued to line 18, page 74.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry, if I may have the attention of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I wish to submit at the proper stage one or two motions to amend the amendment and to strike out certain items. I do not want it to be considered that by waiting until the conclusion of the reading of the amendment I have waived the offering of those amendments so that I shall have to move a reconsideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator can safely allow the reading to go on until we get through and then have a vote on one or more items, as he desires.

Mr. KING. I do not wish unnecessarily to delay the reading.

Mr. McCUMBER. Personally, I will consent to that.

Mr. KING. I have no objection that the reading may be concluded.

The reading of the amendment was concluded, it being, on page 1, after line 5, to strike out:

The name of John J. Kraft, late of Company A, Fiftieth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Patrick Collins, late of Company A, Fifty-ninth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Robert Sutor, late of Company I, First Regiment Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Mary J. Van Denbergh, widow of Jacob Van Denbergh, late of Company D, One hundred and twentieth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of William A. Wilson, late of Company F, One hundred and forty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Nancy J. Clark, widow of Thomas J. Clark, late of Company K, One hundred and eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Jane McMahon, widow of Matthew McMahon, late of Company D, Second Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Zora Hockman, helpless and dependent daughter of Aaron Hockman, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

The name of William D. Dennison, late of Company H, Twenty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Callie B. Boatright, widow of John T. Boatright, late of Company A, First Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of George T. Baldwin, helpless and dependent son of William L. Baldwin, late of Company K, Twenty-seventh Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, protests against the passage of the bill now under consideration will be as unavailing as those heretofore interposed to pension bills and to measures making serious drains upon the Public Treasury. No appeals to the Senate avail when bills are presented calling for Federal appropriations. Over and over again I have challenged attention to the extravagance of this Congress and to its failure to deal with constructive legislation.

Our duty following the World War was to deal with the vital problems which the war produced. The treaty of Versailles called for prompt consideration. Our international relations demanded adjustment. We had been associated with the allied nations in the titanic conflict precipitated by the mad ambitions of the German and Austro-Hungarian Empires. The defeat of the enemy devolved responsibilities upon the victorious nations and called for the highest statesmanship and also required cordial cooperation upon the part of those who had joined in the peace treaty. Domestic problems were more or less involved in the solution of our international problems. It was therefore necessary that questions involved in the settlement of the war be promptly considered and acted upon. But we have refused to ratify the treaty or to cooperate with the Allies in settling the questions resulting from the war. Neither Germany nor Austria-Hungary knows what the attitude of this Nation will be with respect to the terms of peace or the cognate questions involved. Our late allies are left in a state of bewilderment because of the uncertain and equivocal attitude of this Nation.

At the conclusion of the war the allied nations had the right to believe that this great Republic would not only participate in framing the terms of peace but would exert a powerful influence in the enforcement of such terms and in bringing peace and order to a distracted world. Our attitude, however, has been disappointing both to our allies and to our defeated foes. We have not only refused to support the treaty affirmatively, but our conduct has been the equivalent of active opposition to its enforcement.

It has been charged that our position has given encouragement to revolutionary and reactionary groups in the Central Empires to resist the terms of the treaty. Whether that be true or not, I think conditions justify the statement that our refusal to participate in the treaty, or actively associate ourselves with the allied nations in bringing about peace and stable conditions in Europe, has been an impediment to the efforts made in that direction and has postponed the advent of that period when order and peace and national and international good will shall obtain.

I concede there may be an honest difference of opinion upon the part of the American people concerning the acceptance without modification of the terms of the peace treaty, including the covenant of the League of Nations. Whether or not its provisions without modification or reservation were acceptable, there is still a duty resting upon this Nation to do its part in determining the questions which the war raised. Notwithstanding the ocean divides us from Europe, we are interested in Europe and in her people and in the problems which she has to face. We may attempt to escape the currents which carry nations in their powerful sweep, but isolation and absolute independence is impossible. Against our will and without our fault we were drawn into the World War.

The American people are demanding a merchant marine. They have willingly expended more than $3,000,000,000 in building and purchasing ships. They appreciate the fact that their prosperity depends upon foreign commerce. We want the American flag to be seen upon every sea and in every port. We realize we must trade with the peoples of the world, that our raw materials and finished products must find their way to all parts of the earth, and that our ships must return laden with the products of other lands. Europe has furnished us the most important field for our surplus products. The rehabilitation of Europe depends upon whether her people can obtain from the United States not only raw materials but our finished products. The unhappy people of the impoverished nations of Europe must have peace and stable and secure conditions before they are able to obtain from this country those commodities indispensable to the life and welfare of the people. The renaissance of Europe and the prosperity of her people will contribute to the prosperity of the American people and to the development of our resources and industries.

Our country does not occupy that high station which it should have assumed in this great world crisis. Its wealth, its power, its ideals, its great contribution to the cause of international justice, made it the commanding figure among all the nations of the world. It was not only the leader in material things but its splendid service in the great world conflict gave it the moral leadership which no nation could dispute. Unfortunately we have not held high the standard, and there be many who believe that we have permitted the symbol of leadership to drop from our grasp. Has this country occupied that high position of constructive statesmanship which our domestic problems required? Has there not been upon our part a failure to measure up to the high standard of duty in dealing with the pressing domestic problems? Has there not been failure to discharge international responsibilities?

The Republican Party has been in power in the legislative branch of the Government for more than one year. The record which has been made is disappointing to all patriotic Americans. Within a short time there will be an adjournment, and the people of the Nation will have an opportunity to weigh in the balance the achievements of this Republican Congress and determine whether its record is of such a character as to merit the confidence and support of the electorate of this Republic.

I have stated upon a number of occasions that the Republican Party assumed control in both branches of Congress promising economy and measures of reform. Pledges were made that important legislation would be enacted in the interest of domestic peace and for the welfare and prosperity of the people. There are some measures to the credit of the party in power, but the constructive measures which have been passed have been marred by serious and indeed fundamental defects and imperfections.

Instead of developing a spirit of self-reliance and independence upon the part of the people and encouraging a spirit of local self-government, efforts have been made to further atrophy the States and destroy individual initiative and strengthen the bureaucratic and consolidating tendencies which are so powerfully operating throughout the land. People have been encouraged to subordinate their States, to weaken their powers, and to emasculate their authority.

I can perhaps be justly charged with dwelling with irritating persistency upon this note. Upon a number of occasions I have pointed to the legislation of recent years which is reducing the States to mere shadows of their former spirit and power and to the corresponding development by the Federal Government of authority not granted to it and in the exercise of which it has been guilty of unwarranted usurpations. With the termination of the war Congress was required to legislate for the restoration of peace-time conditions. The situation called for wisdom and statesmanship of the highest order. Revenue laws which were the product of the war should have been modified, revised, and some provisions repealed. A system of taxation should have been devised that did not penalize thrift and savings but which taxed extravagance and waste. The majority party has lacked the courage, if not the ability, to meet this perplexing problem of taxation, and as a result industry is hampered and the prosperity of the people menaced. Legislation has been suggested and measures have been passed which were wholly without merit, but were designed to meet appeals and demands not founded in justice or resting upon the thought of the people's welfare. There has been too much of a disposition to recognize classes and groups, and consequently to enact class and group legislation. I think it can be truthfully charged that much of the projected legislation of this Congress has been destructive of the concept of national unity and freedom from class consciousness and has fostered the dangerous heresy that legislation should be for classes and special interests. There are always many difficulties, and indeed perils, attending the transformation from war to peace.

It would not be possible, nor have I the time to enter into a discussion of the psychological processes through which a nation passes from peace to war or from war back to the spirit and habits of peace. Laws must be enacted and repealed in effectuating these changes, and sometimes constitutions and fundamental charters have been stretched or overturned. We have not approached the serious questions involved in this transition from a war status to a peace status with that broad and comprehensive vision essential to correct and statesmanlike action. I repeat, the legislative record of the majority party in Congress is disappointing. There has been too much dodging, too much equivocation, too much of the subtle and Machiavellian spirit which result in delays, compromises, illusions, false hopes, and in the end disappointment, resentment, and bitter antagonisms which undermine the faith and confidence of many in their Government and lead to secret and covert attacks upon its integrity. One culpable propensity upon the part of the majority party is to foster and encourage extravagant appropriations.

I stated a few moments ago that the policy of the Republican Party had been to weaken individuality, enervate States, and disintegrate community life, and to encourage a disposition to seek Federal assistance for individuals and States and to insist upon the assertion of unauthorized power by the Federal Government in the interests of individuals and for private advantage.

I have heretofore directed attention to the weakening of individual and State spirit and pride and to the increasing appetite for Federal benefactions. It has seemed to me that there has been a violent recrudescence of past Republican policies which brought to its support a vast army of voters. That party was supposed to be the faithful advocate and unswerving friend of bounties and pensions and tariffs and special and discriminatory legislation. I think it is not a partisan statement, but merely the recitation of a historic fact, when I say that for many years the Republican Party enacted legislation demanded by certain industries and business enterprises throughout the land. Protection became the formidable rampart behind which vested and special interests, predatory forces, corrupt and sinister organizations protected themselves, and from which they sallied forth from time to time as did the robbers and pirates of old to despoil the weak and the provident and the peaceful of the limited substance which their industry and economy had enabled them to accumulate.

So this Congress has been profligate in its expenditures and responsive to the demands for bounties, pensions, and appropriations without reference to merit or regard for the Constitution or the principles of justice and fair dealing.

A short time age we passed a bill carrying $65,000,000 per annum as additional pensions to the survivors of the Civil War and to their alleged dependents. Only a few months prior to the passage of that bill Congress had passed a measure granting large increases to the same classes. When the measure last referred to was before the House and Senate committees representatives of various organizations promoting the legislation appeared and declared that if the demands embodied in the then pending measure were granted no further requests would ever be made for pension legislation in behalf of those who had in any way been connected with the Civil War. At that time there were, as I recall, amounts being paid annually to the survivors of the Civil War aggregating more than $220,000,000. Within a few months after the bill was passed there was a nation-wide movement demanding the passage of what is known as the Fuller bill. When that measure was before the committee, representations were made that if it were passed that would satisfy the demands of the survivors of the Civil War and their families and that no further legislation would be asked for. That bill is now a law. Under it and existing legislation nearly $300,000,000 will be paid during the coming fiscal year as pensions to the survivors of the Civil War and to those who claim benefactions and Federal grants through them. It must be understood that millions and tens of millions of dollars are annually paid to widows of soldiers whose marriages were comparatively recent and though they have had numerous husbands. Notwithstanding the promises made by those who have been representatives of organizations engaged in securing pensions, we now have before us a bill that provides for pensions for a large number of individuals. A number of those who are to receive pensions under this bill are obtaining pensions under the Fuller bill and, I think, under other enactments.

It is manifest that there will be no limit to the demands for pensions. We satisfy the demands of to-day and additional ones are urged upon the morrow. And this is to be expected. We have encouraged the view that the Government has unlimited resources and that there is something honorable in obtaining contributions and appropriations from the Federal Treasury. The view is being encouraged that for any form of service under the Government a pension should be granted. Indeed, there is an active school of thought in our land that teaches that it is the duty of the Federal Government to care for the people in all parts of the land; that it should provide for the indigent and needy; care for the sick and disabled; support the derelicts and ne'er-do-wells; provide insurance without cost or, if with cost, at a price so low as to be negligible in amount to all persons; pension the aged and infirm; and generally assume control over the people, their private concerns, and business activities. We often hear of old-age pensions, and compensation for those who are injured, and the rehabilitation of all classes who have been disabled, and vocational training for men and women who have sustained injury, or who, because of their incapacity for one line of work, desire to engage in some other. The National Government is to be the father of the people, and spread its omnipotent hand over individuals, communities, and States, and rule and reign without limit or restriction. Of course, when the Constitution is broken down, and the dual form of government provided in the Constitution is no longer recognized, these views will become more or less prevalent and find strong supporters.

Let it be understood that I am discussing grants by the Federal Government, not by the States. It may well be that the latter should provide a system of pensions for the aged and indigent. Indeed there is a duty resting upon the States to provide for certain of its citizens, to afford opportunity for education to the children, and aid to the helpless and distressed.

But I will address myself to the measure before us. Let me briefly refer to some of the acts of Congress providing for pensions. The acts of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1873, section 46937, Revised Statutes, provided pensions for former members of the Military and Naval Establishments who had incurred wounds, disease, or other disability in the service. The pensions were graduated from $6 per month to $100 per month, according to degree of disability. The disability pension act applied to all soldiers and sailors of the Union who served prior to the declaration of war against Germany.

Disability pensions are granted without regard to length or place of service or whether the service was in war or in times of peace. The beneficiary may have served but a day or an hour, and the disability claimed may have no relation to such service, but be of entirely independent origin. This disability pension is granted not only to those whose names were upon the rolls during the Civil War but those who were connected with the Indian wars or the War with Spain.

A few days ago we passed what is known as the Sells bill, which calls for millions of dollars annually for pensions for those who were in the Spanish-American War. Under that bill pensions are granted for mere service in the Army or Navy to all persons upon reaching the age of 62 years. They are to receive pensions whether they are rich or poor, whether perfect in health and the possessors of thousands of dollars annually by way of income or otherwise. The pensions are likewise granted to all persons without attaining that age if they are suffering from a disability, though the disability has no relation whatever to such service in the Army or Navy.

Some of the bills which we have passed for pensions can not be defended, and they establish precedents that will be of serious import to our country.

A few hours ago the House of Representatives passed a measure granting service pensions the aggregate of which will probably be $2,000,000,000. There seems to be a total disregard of the theory of pensions, of the question of how the money is to be raised to meet the billions of dollars appropriated from the Public Treasury. Congress seems to be mad on the question of appropriations. We proceed as do some foolish individuals who have suddenly become the possessors of fortunes. They spend it in extravagance and riotous living and in an incredibly short time find themselves in the bankruptcy courts. Nothing seems to restrain the propensity of this Congress to spend money. I have repeatedly denounced the extravagance and the wasteful appropriations made and shall continue to protest against this insane policy, which can have but one result. It tends to undermine the morality of the people and will lead to national bankruptcy.

Mr. DIAL. I discover in the bill that pensions are granted to "former widows." Does that mean that they have married again, and we are giving them a pension because they have a second husband?

Mr. KING. The Senator from South Carolina, I am afraid, is somewhat of a novice in pension legislation. Widows to the nth degree may obtain pensions.

Mr. DIAL. I did not know the legislation was designed to take care of second husbands. I was merely trying to learn.

Mr. KING. There is no limitation. A woman may have been married 10 or 15 or 20 times, but if she at any time was the widow of some man who was entitled to a pension, if she subsequently becomes a widow, she obtains a pension.

Mr. DIAL. I was struck with the novel expression "former widow."

Mr. KING. The Fuller Act, approved May 1, 1920, was a Civil War service pension act. It grants to every surviving soldier of the Civil War who served 90 days, and who was honorably discharged or who was discharged for disability incurred in the service without having served 90 days, or is presently on the pension rolls under any general or special act, a monthly pension of $50, which is increased to a maximum of $72 in cases where the soldier is helpless and requires the attention of other persons. To the surviving widows of soldiers of the Civil War who served 90 days or who are pensionable under the act that act grants a pension of $30 per month, with the limitation that the widow shall have married the soldier prior to June 27, 1905—40 years subsequent to the close of the Civil War.

It was intended by Congress, as I understood the attitude of the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that the Fuller Act should be liberal enough to provide for all properly pensionable surviving veterans or widows of veterans who served for 90 days in the Civil War.

It is not contended that the word "service" means actual service upon the battle field or in any fighting unit. A man is in service if his name is upon the roll, though he was never within a thousand miles of a battle field and never saw a gun or participated in any skirmish or in any form of military or naval operations. It must be remembered that we have abandoned the policy of granting only "invalid" pensions; we are firmly committed to the policy of granting "service" pensions. It was intended by Congress that this act should forestall and eliminate many thousands of special pension bills which are annually offered and many of which are passed in Congress. It has been estimated that two-thirds of the bills offered in the House of Representatives in the present Congress have been special pension bills and that these have exceeded in number 10,000.

Let me add that, in my opinion, the Fuller bill and all of the preceding pension bills and this bill now before us will not prevent the introduction of a multitude of special and private pension bills in the future, thousands and tens of thousands of which will become laws. Why, Mr. President, these pension bills, like Tennyson's brook, will go on and on forever. We will not only grant pensions to those who claim to have been connected in some degree, remote or direct, with military or naval operations, but we are so obsessed with the idea of pensions that we will build up a civil pension list that will impose upon the taxpayers of this country hundreds of millions of dollars annually. Indeed, if we pass the pending pension bills in this Congress there will be imposed upon the people of the United States for the coming fiscal year not $1,000,000,000 but there will be imposed upon the people approximately $3,000,000,000 for pensions.

When a Republican Congress some years ago appropriated $1,000,000,000 for all purposes it drove the Republican Party from power at the next election. The American people are occasionally aroused to the necessity of economy and insist that waste and extravagance upon the part of their public servants shall cease. I see, I confess, no evidence at the present time of any eagerness upon the part of the American people for economy in the administration of public affairs. We can not appeal, apparently, from a Philip drunk to a Philip sober, because there is no Philip sober now. When it comes to the matter of appropriations we are all drunk with the desire for Federal assistance, for burglarizing the Treasury of the United States.

It is immaterial that the Treasury is empty, that it may be like the cupboard which is bare; there will be an insistent demand that additional taxes be imposed upon the people, and still more taxes, regardless of the fact that every dollar of taxes which is imposed ultimately must rest upon the bowed back of the laboring man and the ultimate consumer.

There are many foolish people who entertain the idea that all taxes levied will be paid by the merchant, the banker, those who have large incomes and extensive property holdings. But a little reflection will convince us that if we increase the burden of taxes upon the merchant he passes them on to the individuals who purchase his commodities, and so it is with most forms of our Federal system of taxation—the men who pay the taxes pass the burden on to the ultimate consumer, and finally the laboring man, the man of slender resources, sustains most of the burdens imposed through the profligate and wasteful appropriations made by Congresses and legislative departments of States or political subdivisions. One is led to the conclusion that the people believe there is no limit to the capacity of the Government to meet obligations.

We are crying out against high prices; we know that high prices, in part, are superinduced by the vast volume of credit money and of bonds which are the basis of credit that were issued during the war through which we have passed. Yet whenever there is an effort to contract the basis of credit to the end that prices may be reduced in a normal and perhaps in a legitimate and proper way, we are immediately confronted with the situation that some particular branch of industry or industrial activity will be unduly affected to its disadvantage and to its serious, if not permanent, injury. Nevertheless our Republican friends here in Congress on the eve of adjournment do not seem to appreciate the importance of making a record for economy, but seem to be more concerned in greater expenditures, greater profligacy in the appropriations which are made, as if they expected to derive some advantage in the coming election by reason of the fact that they have made such enormous appropriations.

It used to be urged, Mr. President, in support of pensions that if the money were appropriated it would justify the party in power in the continuation of high tariffs in order that there might be larger accretions to the Treasury of the United States, and there were many people who seemed to conceive a close connection between enormous pensions and high tariff. High tariff, it was said, brought large sums into the Treasury, and enormous pensions would dissipate those funds, and so there would be a sort of perpetual motion, a circle created in the land.

Mr. President, I want, however, to acquit my Republican friends of being the sole offenders in extravagance in appropriations made in this Congress. The minority party can not affirm that its skirts are entirely clear. The appetite for Federal appropriations is an all-consuming one, and is not restricted or confined to class or section or party. Whenever we can get money out of the Treasury of the United States the disposition is to get it, and to get it quickly, and to get it often, and to persist in getting it. It is not a picture of which we can be proud, in my humble opinion, when we witness the extent and character of the appropriations that have been made during the present Congress.

Returning to the point that I was discussing, the House at this session, if my figures are correct, has passed more than 2,926 special pension bills; and in addition, as I have stated, there have been passed through the House these other bills—the Fuller bill, the Sells bill, and omnibus bills—carrying millions and tens of millions of dollars.

I understand that it was the purpose of the Senate committee to eliminate from the bills pending before that committee those claims and those cases which were provided for in the Fuller bill. The result was that out of the 2,926 House bills and more than 1,900 Senate bills pending before that committee the Senate committee culled out 686 bills and incorporated them in the measure now before us, known as H. R. 12530. This bill was reported to the Senate a few days ago by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], accompanied by an elaborate report containing more than 280 pages of closely printed matter. Although the committee intended, as I am advised, not to include within this bill any cases which were covered by the Fuller Act, the fact is that the bill contains the cases of more than 54 individuals alleged to be widows who have married and remarried, but are now widows, who are pensionable under the general law as construed and applied by the Bureau of Pensions in cases where the remarriage of the widow has been dissolved by death or divorce. There is therefore no reason and no purpose in having these cases included in this bill.

The bill also contains 65 cases of widows of soldiers who served for less than 90 days and are not pensionable except under disability pension laws. I submit that special legislation of this kind is discriminatory in character, is unfair, and can not be defended. If one solder who served less than 90 days is entitled to a service pension, then every soldier who has served less than 90 days is entitled to a service pension, and it is rank discrimination to approve and report favorably cases of this character.

If Congress desires to pension veterans of the Civil War who served but 60 days and who were honorably discharged it should pass an act for this purpose, so that all soldiers of this class may be treated with justice and equity as between themselves. I pause to inquire if this—if I may be pardoned the vernacular of the speech—is a "feeler" with a view ultimately to breaking down this legislative wall which for many years has held back, perhaps, an increased tide of applications for pensions. I presume there was some reason prompting Congress to fix 90 days as the limit of service before pensions would be granted merely for service. That has been, I understand, the unbroken policy in the past. I understand that that is the law, that before one is entitled to a service pension he must have had his name upon the rolls of the military or the naval branch of the Government for at least 90 days. We are breaching this rule. This bill breaks down this wall and announces now that a man need not have had his name upon the rolls for 90 days in order to obtain a pension. Of course, we all understand that he need not have been wounded; he need not have been injured; it is not necessary that he should have incurred any disability while in the service in order to obtain a pension. The mere fact that his name was upon the roll for 90 days, though he was in no camp, though he may never have gone a thousand yards from his home, entitles him to a pension, and that notwithstanding the fact that he may be worth millions and be the recipient of a large sum annually from private investments. Not satisfied with a general service pension, this bill is edging along the way of granting service pensions to men who served less than 90 days.

Mr. President, there may be reasons for breaking down this rule. There may be ample justification for the position taken by the distinguished chairman of the committee and those members of the committee who followed him in his recommendations with respect to this bill, but if so, none has been submitted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCORMICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator seems to forget that the rule to which he refers was broken down long ago. This omnibus bill provides pensions for 652 persons, of whom 555 are women and 97 are men. The great bulk of the beneficiaries are women, and a great many of the women are divorced women. The bill is really designed, among other things, to pay alimony to divorced women. Now, that may be a good rule, but even that is not a new one. Of course, the pension is limited to the woman who is not to blame for the divorce; but if you can find a woman applying for a pension who has been divorced anywhere in the United States, and who is to blame for it, I should like to know what her name is.

Mr. KING. I am very glad to receive the suggestions of the Senator from Colorado; they illustrate the madness that has taken possession of Congress in its desire to give gratuities and pensions and bounties to thousands and hundreds of thousands and ultimately to millions of the people of the United States.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator whether he ever heard of a man who recently died worth $7,000,000 who was drawing a pension?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. I have heard of it. I did not know whether it was true or not.

Mr. KING. There is no question about it. There was a man, the value of whose property was $7,000,000, who received for services in an important position in the Government for years a large salary, and who later resigned that position to assume a legislative place of influence and honor, in which position he received a large salary, and during all that time he was the possessor of great wealth.

Why, Mr. President, for that matter, I have before me a book recently printed by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, coming from the Division of Economics and History, entitled "Federal Military Pensions in the United States." It was written by Prof. William H. Glasson, professor of political economy and social science at Trinity College, North Carolina.

It was edited by Prof. David Kinley, professor of political economy in the University of Illinois, and a member of the committee of research of the endowment. It was printed in 1918. If I had the time, I should be glad to invite the attention of the Senator and others who are interested to the frauds which have been perpetrated upon the Government of the United States under the name of pensions, and to the wrongs which have been committed, and to the prostitution of the pension system in the United States.

Let me read this sentence. The editor says:

> The evil influence of the above trend on the moral and patriotic character of the pensioners themselves soon became evident. Many of them came to look upon their pensions as rewards for service rather than as tokens of the country's appreciation of their patriotism. But the pension which any country can ordinarily pay is wholly inadequate if regarded as a reward for services. Naturally, therefore, the pensioners insisted on larger pensions, and, assisted by the claim agent and the politician, they pushed their claims until the financial drain on the country became a serious one. This is likely to happen in a democracy.

One great writer has stated that one of the evils to be feared in a democracy is a civil pension and a military pension system. One of the specters that appears in the pathway of our Nation is that which results from the growing disposition upon the part of the American people to establish a permanent Federal pension system. This spirit is leading to demands not only for Federal military and naval pensions but also for civil pensions, and ultimately it will extend, under this paternalistic trend of our country, to the granting of pensions to the aged and to the infirm, to the widow and to the orphan, notwithstanding the police powers of the States, and the duties and the obligations resting upon the States, if there shall be indigent people within their borders needing support, to properly care for them. The virus of socialism is spreading and destructive heresies are gaining support. States are being urged to abandon their duties and yield to the Federal Government the sovereign powers which they possess.

Mr. President, we should fight against this effort, which seeks, in the language of Marshall, to "compound the people of all the States into one mass, and to confer upon the National Government the authority which, under our form of government, is with the States and the people within the States."

Mr. DIAL. It will make mendicants and vagrants of them after a while.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when a malignant disease attacks, its development must be arrested or it will speedily destroy its victim. There may not be a happy parallel between the illustration just given and the situation of the Government, but it nevertheless is true of any government that if evils exist which corrode or affect the body politic or the moral attributes of the people, and they are not checked, they will affect the entire body politic.

Mr. President, let me say to the Senator there is no promise of immortality to this Republic. Its duration depends upon the justice and righteousness of the people. The spirit of Locke and Milton and Montesquieu and the heroic figures who held the torch of liberty preceding the founding of this Republic rested upon the immortal men who gave us the Declaration of Independence and wrote the Constitution of these United States. No human government is perfect, nor can the finite mind conceive or execute a perfect thing. Nevertheless, there was established a government dedicated to the proposition that all men were equal and that justice should be the basis of all governmental authority. Influenced by the spirit which actuated the fathers and applying the principles of the Government which they established, there was developed upon this continent the mightiest Nation the world has ever seen. Moreover, it is the freest Nation under which any people ever lived. It recognizes the individual as sovereign and as the source of authority and power. The spirit of independence possessed by our fathers developed strong, virile men and women and local communities in which the principles of free government found full expression. Each State was sovereign, a republic, a government exercising the powers of a sovereign government. The people protested against worn-out creeds—religious and political—and became a great force—moral and political—throughout the world. They believed that "an irreducible minimum of compulsion is the very essence of good government." They wanted no centralized authority, no autocratic power, no deadly bureaucracy, but strong individuals and local forums in which the virtues of local self-government could be exhibited.

Prof. Lieber states:

Let everything that is in favor of power be closely construed, and everything in favor of the security of the citizen and the protection of the individual comprehensively, for the simple reason that power is power; it is able to care for itself and tend by its nature to increase, while the citizen needs protection.

This liberty loving, sturdy people founded Commonwealths, built towns and cities, and, crossing a mighty continent, have builded a Nation that stands out as the highest example of a representative democracy and possesses that majesty which alone can be found in a government which is the embodiment of the people's will.

The work which the English race began when it colonized North America is destined to go on until every land on the earth's surface that is not already the seat of an old civilization shall become English in its language, in its political habits, and traditions. * * * The race thus spread over both hemispheres, and from the rising to the setting sun, will not fail to keep that sovereignty of the sea and that commercial supremacy which it began to acquire when England stretched its arm across the Atlantic to the shores of Virginia and Massachusetts. * * * The world's business will be transacted by English-speaking people to so great an extent that whatever language any man may have learned in his infancy he will find it necessary sooner or later to learn to express his thoughts in English.

Such were the words of John Fiske in his "American Political Ideals." And this statement is vindicated in the progress which this Nation has made.

But the strength of the Nation rests upon the strength of the individuals and upon the capacity of the people for local self-government. If individualism is crushed and the capacity for local self-government destroyed and the principles which constitute the basis of this Republic are departed from, then this Republic will be endangered. This movement toward paternalism must be arrested and the rights of the people and the States jealously guarded. There must be no submergence of the rights of the States, and no Federalism, drawing to itself by the gaudy trappings of power the great States which swing in their orbits along predestined and fixed paths.

Let me recur to the book I was reading from when I digressed for a moment:

The moral degeneration caused in time by the changing view of the true character of pensions led also to the evil of extending them to men whose service was brief and resulted in no injury to them. Moreover, pensions were taken without compunction by some men who, while technically entitled to them, had other means of adequate support and, indeed, were sometimes rich, to say nothing of young widows of old soldiers. For such people to take pensions is to throw a shadow of graft on the whole system.

Mr. President, there are pages in this volume which explain with more or less detail the pension system in the United States and some of the evils which have developed in the application of that system.

I have repeatedly said, and I wish to reiterate the statement, that the men who gave their lives for their country should be remembered with gratitude and their widows and their chilren should be generously treated by a grateful Nation. The men who are wounded in the service of their country, who incur disabilities in such service, should likewise be generously and liberally cared for by the Republic. I believe in generous treatment in behalf of those who are suffering from disabilities resulting from service to their country.

But I can not bring my mind to accept a policy of indiscriminate service pensions, to give pensions to everybody who may have served for a few days, notwithstanding his wealth, regardless of his physical condition, though he may be worth millions and though his health may be wholly unimpaired. I can find in my conscience no justification for the application of the pension system to cases of that character.

The bill before us contains about 170 cases of widows who can not establish in the Pension Office a legal status as the widow of the deceased soldier. These include women who at the time they claim to have married the soldier were the undivorced, legal wives of other men, and hence were guilty of bigamy in assuming marital relations with the soldier, and other women who attempted to marry the soldier at a time when the soldier himself had a living wife, and other women who have forfeited their rights to pensions by moral irregularities. The Pension Bureau seems to recognize common-law marriages and to accord the widows of such marriages a pensionable status. The cases referred to are cases where even a common-law marriage could not legally have been contracted between the parties. Congress has been liberal, indeed, in according widows who married soldiers of the Civil War within 40 years after the close of the war a pensionable status, and Congress should, therefore, insist that such marriages come within the sanction of the common law and of the marriage statutes of the several States. It is vicious, indeed, to encourage the bringing in of pension claims of this character.

The bill contains 75 cases of widows who married soldiers subsequent to June 27, 1905. Congress has fixed a 40-year limit on soldier marriages, and I can see no reason why there should be a departure from that policy and the adoption of a different one by these special acts, though they be carried in an omnibus bill of the character of the one under consideration.

If one widow has married a soldier since June 27, 1905, is to be granted a pension, then every widow of a Civil War veteran who married the soldier after June 27, 1905, should be given a pensionable status. This should be done by general act of Congress, and not by these special bills which have been so numerous. Special acts in such cases are discriminatory, improper, and unfair.

The bill contains 127 cases of widows who are presently on the pension rolls and who under the Fuller Act are entitled to be pensioned at $30 per month, who are asking to have their pensions increased to $35, $40, $50, and $72 per month on the ground that they are helpless or have helpless children. It is very much doubted if the bounty of Congress to widows ought to be extended in any case beyond $30 per month as provided in the Fuller Act. If exceptions are to be made—and I do not affirm that conditions may not be of such a character as to call for the rigid application of the rule referred to—and if Congress and the special committees of Congress approve and report claims of this character, there will be no end of the flood of bills which will be offered to increase pensions above the rates fixed by law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Do I understand the Senator to say that the bill contains the names of widows who are granted $72 a month?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator call my attention to some of them?

Mr. KING. I would have to take a few moments to do so, but I feel sure that that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are some soldiers who have been granted $72 a month, but if the bill contains the names of widows who are granted $72 a month my attention has not been called to it.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator from North Dakota that I think they are cases in which there may be dependent children, and the payment would go to the widow.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not recall a case where such a sum would be given to the widow and dependent children. I think the Senator will find that he is in error about any widow receiving that; but I would not want to speak absolutely at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I am in error I shall be very glad to make proper correction, and if this bill goes over until to-morrow for a final vote I will take the pains to look through the record very carefully to-night to verify the statement which I have made.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator will allow us to get through to-day. I have tried to be accommodating to the Senator, so as to give him all the time necessary to look up matters pertaining to the bill; but realizing that to-morrow we will perhaps take all day upon the Armenian question, and this bill must pass the House after we get through, I hope the Senator will allow us to get a final vote on it this evening before adjournment. I do not think the Senator will find a case where $72 is appropriated for a widow. There have been large sums granted to the widows of generals heretofore, and rather larger sums than $72, but I do not think there are any of them in this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a limit must be set somewhere and the only thing that Congress may safely and prudently do is to halt all these cases at the threshold where they exceed the limit which has been established by general law. The purpose of the recent liberal general law was to relieve Congress of the flood of private pension bills which has inundated both branches of Congress for many years.

I have said, however, that in my opinion no pension bill that we may pass, regardless of the liberality and even prodigality of its terms, will consummate that result. There will be private pension bills by the hundreds and the thousands, as long as the Senator from North Dakota lives and very much longer, with the present views of many of the American people, and particularly of many politicians in the United States.

The bill contains 178 cases of pensions for adult sons and daughters of deceased pensioners. It is usual, and I ask the attention of Senators to this language in the committee report:

To state in such cases that no one survives who has title to pensions of soldier service—the clear inference being that a pension under the act of Congress is to be considered as a sort of incorporeal hereditament, to pass down by succession to the soldiers' heirs. I have no doubt that after a while a pension will be considered as property which may pass by will, bequest, or devise. At any rate the impression seems to be now that it is personal property, a sort of incorporeal hereditament that may pass to the heirs of the deceased, and of course it is exempt from taxation.

There are about 27 miscellaneous cases, covering instances of soldiers whose military records show desertion, soldiers who had State service as differentiated from Federal service, and widows of Army officers who are claiming increases in pensions above those allowed by the Fuller Act.

Mr. DIAL. To illustrate the Senator's point, if the Senator will look on page 162 of the bill, line 16, and on top of the next page, he will see where it is provided that in case one dies another one's name shall be inserted, "Entail," I believe, is the legal phrase.

Mr. KING. That particular case had escaped my reading, but I have no doubt there will be found others in the bill who will be in the same situation. As I stated, it is regarded as a property right which may be transmitted.

Mr. DIAL. I am learning. I am young in the business, but I am "catching on."

Mr. KING. I wish to state to my friend that I am young in this matter, too. I have not been here long enough to become entirely familiar with the operations of the pension system.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, of course I could not hear the colloquy between the two Senators, but I have made a little further investigation with reference to the Senator's statement based upon his belief that there were provisions for granting widows $72 per month. I will say that there are none in the bill granted $72 per month.

I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that two, who are widows of brigadier generals, have been allowed $50 each. That is not in advance of what we have always allowed since I have been a member of the Committee on Pensions. A distinction has been made between widows of officers and widows of privates. I have taken the position that there should be no distinction, and that poverty meant exactly the same with one class as with the other, but I have been voted down upon that proposition by the Senate probably fifty times at least, and consequently we have allowed that as a rule. Two of them were allowed $50 each. There are two or three other cases where there were two dependent children, where the $30 had been allowed to the widow and $10 each for dependent children, where they are dependent through either physical or mental disability. Those are the only cases, as I am informed, that even reach the $50 limit.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have just run through the bill hastily, and I find that that is the case.

Mr. KING. My recollection, though, is that there are some cases found—and these are the ones to which I alluded—where the widow and the children or the dependent children in the aggregate get $72.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken. The only two cases are where there have been two dependent children, and I think probably in both instances it will be found that they are crippled or mentally defective, where the widow has been allowed her regular $30 and $10 each for the dependent children.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator state the maximum amount which has been granted by special pension to a widow?

Mr. McCUMBER. In the case of one of the doctors, for instance, who allowed himself to be bitten by a mosquito infected with yellow fever and died as a result of that experimentation, the widow was granted more than $50 a month. In all other cases we have never gone above $50 a month in a report of the committee, whether of a private or of an officer, and in this particular bill there are none of them that are granted more than $50 a month.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my recollection is somewhat different from that of the Senator from North Dakota. I have not the time to examine in detail the bill before us or other pension measures in order to ascertain the largest amounts paid from time to time as pensions to widows.

This bill, as I have stated, is an omnibus bill carrying numerous private pension bills. I have indicated the classes into which these special claims fall. They are as follows:

1. Widows who married the ex-soldier since June 27, 1905, and whose husbands did not die from disability incurred in the service.

2. Soldiers who served less than 90 days in the Civil War and who incurred no disability in the service.

3. Widows of soldiers who served less than 90 days in the Civil War and who did not die from disability incurred in service.

4. Widows who have married and remarried one or more times since the death of the soldier under whom they claim.

5. Widows who at the time they claimed to have married the soldier were married and undivorced from other men and who were consequently guilty of bigamy.

6. Widows who claimed to have married the soldier at a time when he had another living undivorced wife, thus depriving them of the status of a wife.

7. Dependent sons and daughters of adult age of deceased soldiers who put forth a claim to succeed to the pension allowed their soldier father.

8. Deserters.

9. Widows of deserters.

10. Persons already on the pension roll who desire increase in pensions.

11. Persons who have been the benficiaries of one, two, three, or more special acts of Congress.

None of these persons are entitled to pensions under existing law. Hence this method of making them beneficiaries of appropriations from the Federal Treasury. Notwithstanding the liberal pension laws enacted by Congress, special pension bills are pressed with constant and increasing force for affirmative action by Congress.

Before the Civil War very few private pension acts were passed by Congress. But beginning with the Forty-eighth Congress the number of pension bills presented and enacted into law showed a remarkable increase. During the years from 1861 to 1863, inclusive, there were only 12 special pension acts. During the Thirty-eighth Congress there were 27 private pension acts; during the Thirty-ninth Congress there were 138 such acts; during the Fortieth Congress the number was 275; the Forty-first Congress enacted 85; the Forty-second, Forty-third, Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, and Forty-seventh Congresses enacted an aggregate of 989 private pension bills. A large number of special acts passed in the Forty-eighth Congress, the number being 598. The Forty-ninth Congress passed 856 special pension bills and the Fiftieth Congress, 1,015. The Fifty-first increased the number to 1,388. There was a pronounced increase in the number of special acts during the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, and Fifty-fifth Congresses, the aggregate being 1,408. With the Fifty-sixth Congress the number of special acts increased to 1,391. In the Fifty-seventh there were 2,171, and the Fifty-eighth Congress passed 3,358. The Fifty-ninth Congress enacted 6,030 special acts, and the Sixtieth, 6,600. During the Sixty-first Congress the high-water mark of special pension acts was reached, the number enacted totalling 9,649. In the Sixty-second Congress the number was 6,350, the Sixty-third enacted 5,061, and the Sixty-fourth, 5,885.

It must be apparent that special pension bills produce inequalities, result in favoritism, and exhibit rank discrimination.

President Cleveland vetoed during his first term 228 special acts. Of this number 175 were vetoed because the injuries were not received in military service and in the line of duty. Some vetoes rested upon the ground that the increases allowed over the general law were not justified, that in some cases where the basis of pension was alleged "dependency" there was no proof of the allegation, and other vetoes rested upon the ground that the applicants were deserters. In this bill and others which have become law Congress has abandoned all the grounds which were urged by President Cleveland for his refusal to give Executive approval to the same. By general law we pension those who received no injury and no disability either in the line of service or otherwise. We have broken down the safeguards erected by law to protect the Treasury against unjustifiable assaults. By special pension bills deserters are cared for; persons not dependents of those whose names were upon the military and naval branches of the United States are made recipients of grants from the Treasury. Persons whose names were upon the rolls for less than 90 days receive consideration. Indeed, if there are any claims of persons who directly or indirectly were in any way connected with the Military or Naval Establishments of the Government during the Civil War who are not being pensioned, I am not aware of it.

Speaking of Mr. Cleveland's attitude upon pensions and of the evils of special pension acts, Prof. Glasson makes the following statement:

The determined stand of Mr. Cleveland against the abuse of special pension legislation had the effect of bringing to the attention of the country the recklessness of Congress in such matters and of securing for a time at least the more careful investigation of private pension claims in the congressional committees. Though the Republican Fifty-first Congress—the first of President Harrison's administration—passed 1,388 private pension acts, the party was committed to liberality in this direction by reason of its criticism of Mr. Cleveland's record. In the second half of the Harrison administration the House of Representatives was overwhelmingly Democratic and only 217 special pension acts were passed. In the four years of Cleveland's second administration 497 private pension bills became law. Mr. Cleveland's successors in the Presidency have not emulated his record of opposition to private pension bills. In the McKinley and Roosevelt administrations the number of such measures increased very largely, and in Mr. Taft's administration 15,999 pensions were granted by special act.

Congress is obviously not a suitable place for the investigation and just settlement of private pension claims. The pressure of general business is too great. There is little time for the detailed discussion of such matters on the floor of either House, and the recommendation of the Pension Committees must usually be followed without question if business is to be done. These committees can give no proper consideration to the thousands of claims presented. The passage of a certain number of pension claims upon plausible representations becomes practically a form of congressional patronage. Some Members are assiduous in seeking pensions for constituents to the exclusion of activities of a more public nature. It would be an improvement upon present methods if Congress should pass special pension bills only upon the recommendation of the Pension Bureau. The general pension laws are liberal, and the number of meritorious claims not within their scope must be very limited. The officers of the Pension Bureau have better facilities to learn the facts and form a just opinion in exceptional cases than Congress, and the history of the bureau will not convict it of bias against claimants. Under the present system there is unfair discrimination against the pensioners under the public laws by reason of the great number of increases secured by private bills for those who are able to gain the favor and aid of Senators and Representatives.

The same author submits a rather serious indictment against Congress. I express no opinion as to the justice of his criticism but submit that those who are familiar with pension legislation will have very decided views with regard to this matter.

In recent years the great majority of pensions granted by special act are in the nature of increases to rates in excess of the amounts provided for in the general laws. In such cases the claim is usually made that the circumstances of the particular applicant justify a rate higher than that normally paid. But it is fairly obvious that such increases are due more to the favor of Members of Congress than to any just and careful comparison of the merits and necessities of the applicants with those of other pensioners receiving the same allowance.

We are all familiar with the fact that a large number of special laws are for the purpose of correcting the military records of those who are shown upon the Government rolls to be deserters. There was never any thought about correcting the record upon the part of a great majority of those shown to be deserters until pensions were desired. Under the law where the records show dishonorable discharge or desertion no pension could be obtained. Accordingly, as stated, there have been for many years hundreds of special pension bills enacted to remove the charge of desertion or the record of dishonorable discharge. As soon as such acts were passed pensions were then paid to the beneficiaries.

Prof. Glasson, in speaking of the passage of private pension bills, states that:

On "pension day" there is commonly no quorum present. In the presence of a few Members, it has been a general practice to take up the pension bills reported by the committee and put them through the form of passage in a perfunctory manner and with remarkable speed. In some Congresses they have been passed at the rate of two or three a minute. Very few Members take the trouble to vote on such occasions or give any attention to the procedure, which is by general consent. Occasionally some disgusted southern Member, or some Member who has a grievance, stops the process temporarily by insisting on the presence of a quorum. Instead of passing a separate law granting each pension, Congress has in recent years followed the practice of including many grants of special pension as items in a sort of omnibus bill. Under this practice, if the President were disposed to veto some objectionable grants he could not do so without at the same time causing the failure of all the other pension provisions in the bill.

The author speaks of "no quorum" being present in the House on "pension days." During the consideration of pension bills in the Senate it is a rare occasion when more than a dozen Senators are present.

As I have stated the American people have always been desirous of dealing generously with the families of those whose lives were given for their country and those who were injured or received disabilities in the line of service. But that generous policy which met with such cordial approbation throughout the country has been departed from and disability pensions are no longer important. The announced plan is to grant service pensions without regard to extent of service or the necessity for governmental gratuities. "Arrears" pension acts have been passed to supplement the general laws, and special acts have followed where the former legislation was inadequate to meet demands for Federal contributions.

A House executive document of the Fifty-first Congress, first session, reveals some of the evils which have grown up in the pension administration. For instance, one of the principal examiners in the Pension Bureau was receiving a salary of $2,000 per year. He filed an application alleging "disability from malarial disease." An examination by the bureau's surgeon refuted his claim. Several years afterward his claim was granted and a pension allowed with arrears extending back to August, 1865, the amount paid being several thousand dollars.

It would be interesting to review in detail the legislation which has been enacted by Congress since the Civil War dealing with pensions, and the activities of the various organizations which have aided such legislation. I shall not, however, take the time of the Senate for that purpose, but will content myself with a hurried reference to these matters. The fact is, however, that local and national organizations have been potential in political parties and have influenced legislation. Demands have been made under threat of defeat of candidates for important political positions who did not signify their approval of policies projected by local organizations or representatives of those who were seeking general or special laws for pensions and governmental grants. In the House reports of the Forty-sixth Congress evidence is submitted which shows the methods employed to secure pension appropriations, which are discreditable to all concerned and constitute a dark page in the legislative experience of our country.

Mr. Bentley, when Commissioner of Pensions, directed attention to the fraudulent claims for pensions prosecuted under laws which had been secured through undue and improper influence. In his statement he uses this language:

As the law stood previous to the passage of the arrears act the temptation to fraud was very great, but since that act it is many times increased. Then the claims were comparatively few in which any considerable sum of money would be the immediate reward of a successfully prosecuted claim, but since that act every invalid claim allowed, as well as many of the other classes, will have in it from several hundred to several thousand dollars due the claimant at the first payment.

It is estimated by those best informed that there have been not less than $2,000,000 paid out annually for fraudulent pensions. In my judgment, the estimate is below rather than above the actual amount.

With the temptation to the commission of fraud so greatly increased, and the road to the Treasury easy through ex parte proceedings, the consequences can easily be foretold. Not only will the people be taxed to pay an annual tribute to the unworthy, amounting to several millions of dollars, but with so many claims pending and still to be presented and the avenues to the two or three hundred persons, more or less, who are charged with their adjustment open for the approach of interested parties, it will be little less than a miracle if extensive official corruption does not follow.

Speaking of the pension act of 1890, Prof. Glasson states that under it pensions might be received by persons who were receiving handsome incomes from their services as skilled workers, or as lawyers, physicians, public officials, business men, and bankers. While the act declared that pensions were to be granted to ex-soldiers for incapacity to perform "manual" labor, it was construed to grant pensions to persons in the lines of employment just referred to.

Pensions were provided for the highly paid but rheumatic lawyer, for the prosperous business man hurt in a street accident, for the ex-soldier public official with heart disease, and for the mechanic who had lost a hand in an industrial accident. It was well to have these ills of life provided for, but questionable whether military reasons required the provision to be made at the expense of the general taxpayer.

There was no distinction in granting pensions to those in affluent circumstances and the poor.

The act was not a national gratuity or dignified form of relief for indigent and infirm veterans, as contemplated by the advocates of a dependent pension bill, for it pensioned alike the rich and the poor, the prosperous and the unprosperous. It was not a reward for long and meritorious service in the Army, for it treated the three through the whole war. It was not a compensation for injuries and disease contracted in the camp or on the battle field, for it pensioned for mental and physical disabilities whenever and wherever incurred, except those resulting from vicious habits.

Under this act this author states that widows' pensions were granted regardless of the cause of the husband's death and to—widows who were unborn, or merely small children when the Civil War ended. * * * This provision especially benefited young women who, long years after the war, married middle-aged or elderly ex-soldiers. It is hard to see why such widows and children born of such marriages are more deserving of national aid than the dependent widows and children of other loyal citizens who were never called upon to perform military service. The experience of the Pension Bureau has also been that the desire on the part of young widows to retain pensions has frequently resulted in immoral alliances rather than in remarriages which would cause the loss of the pensions.

Speaking of this act and the circumstances of its passage, Prof. Glasson says:

It was a high bid for the political support of the 450,000 Grand Army of the Republic men and other ex-soldiers, with both the Republican and Democratic parties bidding. To the professional politician it was a way to spend the surplus, which appealed to the sentiment of the people and which also promised to produce votes for the candidates of the party. Undoubtedly in passing the act of 1890 the Republican Congress and national administration attached strongly to that party the great majority of the Grand Army of the Republic voters.

It was estimated that this act before it was superseded in 1907 cost the country over a billion dollars. Mr. H. Clay Evans, who was Commissioner of Pensions under the McKinley administration, in reporting the practices of the Pension Bureau in administering the act of 1890, said:

I am free to say that the practice has never been to inquire into the capacity of the claimant to earn a support. The prosperous have been pensioned alike, on application, with the less fortunate, plainly on showing disabilities or disease, without any reference to the claimant's wealth or capacity to earn a support.

I referred to the powerful influences which have secured passage of pension legislation. Gen. SHERWOOD, who has been in the House for many years, stated:

You can get anyone to vote for any pension bill you want in any legislature in the North, because the members do not dare to vote against it. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pt. 1, 127.)

Representative Dies, of Texas, indicated a concurrence in this view when he said:

I am a party Democrat and I want my party to win, but the naked truth is that the Democratic Party is just as cowardly on this pension question as ever the Republican Party dared to be. * * * Every man who votes for this pension increase indirectly votes against lower tariff taxation.

The Sherwood bill was passed in the House by a vote of 229 to 93. This measure, it is estimated, has increased the burdens to the Government of more than $75,000,000 per annum. As I recall, the distinguished chairman of the Senate committee [Mr. MCCUMBER] stated that the Sherwood bill would involve an annual increase of more than $75,000,000 and that a bond issue might be required to meet the obligations which it created.

Perhaps the reluctance of members of the National Legislature to oppose pension bills may be in part understood when it is known that on the 30th day of June, 1912, there were more than 846,000 persons on the Federal pension list.

That those receiving pensions from the Federal Government constitute a powerful force in the various States is evident when it is recalled that in 1900 there were in the District of Columbia 1 pensioner for every 22 of the population. In Maine there was 1 pensioner to every 35 of population. In Kansas it was 1 to every 36; in Indiana 1 to every 37; in Ohio 1 to every 40. Ohio in that year received in Federal pensions $15,171,000 and Indiana received $10,339,000. The population of the United States in 1900 was 75,994,575, and the number of Federal pensioners in the country was 988,446.

The Sherwood bill as it passed the House was greatly modified in the Senate. Indeed, a substitute was presented by the Senator from North Dakota which passed by an overwhelming majority and the conferees made some slight changes and accepted the Senate bill; it became a law on May 11, 1912. This act granted pensions to all whose names had been upon the roll for 90 days or more in the Civil War and were 62 years of age or over. It further provided that pensions should be paid without regard to age or length of service to persons who served in the Civil War and were honorably discharged and who were disabled from performing manual labor as the result of wounds received in battle or in the line of duty or as the result of disease or other causes incurred in the line of duty. Within a very short time after the passage of this act more than 4,600 applications for relief under it were filed in the Pension Bureau. This act superseded the service and age pension act of 1907, and within a short time all who were receiving pensions under that act were obtaining the benefits of the act of 1912. Of course, the charge upon the Treasury greatly increased, and in 1914, $172,409,600 was paid as pensions. Another pension bill was passed in September, 1916, under which the list of pensioners was greatly increased. Under its provisions a young woman who married an ex-soldier 40 years after the Civil War may be pensioned for life. She may be married a number of times after the death of the ex-soldier, but whenever she is a widow, regardless of her wealth or income, she is to be pensioned. At the end of the fiscal year of 1917 more than $2,230,000,000 had been paid to those whose names had been upon the rolls of the military and naval branches of the Government, and to their widows and their relatives, in cases where there had been no proof of disability, or injury, or any disabilty contracted while in the military service. In addition to this amount the cost of administering the law amounted to approximately $133,000,000.

Pensions have been granted without discrimination between the poor and the prosperous, and until 1912, as I recall, there was no recognition given to long military service. The 90-day men received the same pension as the soldier who served during the entire war.

The pension system and its administration has been criticized by Prof. Glasson in these words:

The administration of the laws has also been hampered by political pressure and interference. Some administrations have been vigilant to protect the Treasury from imposition and fraud; others have been "liberal" to the point of facilitating the pensioning of persons whose claims were of doubtful merit or supported by false representations. Under the pension laws, imposition has often been easy and the fruits of dishonesty great. The provisions granting pensions for disabilities not of service origin have stimulated dependence among the veterans and tended to place the service of the citizen to the State upon too mercenary a basis.

I have here a number of articles written by Burton J. Hendrick, which were reported in the World's Work, dealing with what he denominates "pork-barrel pensions." Attention is called upon the title page of the pamphlet containing the articles to the fact that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, there were paid for pensions alone more than $172,000,000, and that that amount combined with the expenditures for the Army and Navy give a military budget of more than $466,000,000. We have been accustomed to speak of Prussian militarism, and yet the German Empire in the year 1913 expended only $491,000,000 for pensions and for its military and naval operations. In 1913 our national expenditures, exclusive of the Postal Service, were less than $749,000,000; but we spent more than one-half of our income on our military budget.

In these articles Mr. Burton exposes the methods by which pensions were obtained, describes how deserters were made into heroes by statute, and the methods by which pernicious private pension bills were enacted into law. These articles are a scathing indictment of the work of Congress and the sinister and improper influences which have procured legislation dealing with pensions. In a former speech I have referred to these articles and will therefore make no further reference to them at this time.

The Senator from North Dakota is anxious to have this bill passed to-night. I have no doubt his views are shared by other Senators; at least, by those who are in attendance. The great majority of the Members of this body manifest no interest in the measure, assuming, I presume, that it will encounter no successful opposition and will speedily receive the approval of the Senate. Let me repeat what I said when the so-called Sells bill was before the Senate: It is impossible to defeat any pension bill. Indeed, it is impossible to accomplish the defeat of any appropriation bill. Experience has demonstrated that Congress is impotent to cope with organizations formed in our country for the purpose of obtaining contributions from the Treasury of the United States. No matter the character of the appropriations sought, whether worthy or unworthy, whether meritorious or devoid of merit, if the organizations back of it are powerful enough and continue their efforts and pressure with sufficient zeal and pertinacity, they will in the end secure what they ask.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment on that proposition?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. It became my duty on Saturday to lay before the Senate the terms of an understanding between the Literary Digest and the postal employees' unions of the country, one of the most sordid arrangements for securing aid from the Treasury that has thus far come under my notice. Not a single paper in the United States, so far as I have been able to ascertain, up to this time has said a word about it; not a word. The great papers of New York yesterday morning and the Washington and other papers which I have examined all were as silent as the grave upon the proposition, and largely, I presume, because they expect to be in time the beneficiaries of the agreement, if it shall succeed to the extent of repealing the present rates of second-class postage.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret to learn of the incident to which the Senator refers. Revelations of this kind are very depressing to me and I believe they must similarly affect all patriotic Americans. My information has been to the effect that the postal employees were not adequately paid. I have indicated to a number of them that I would support a measure that gave them relief and a just and fair compensation.

If it be a fact that the employees of the Government adopted methods referred to by the Senator from Colorado a few days ago, for the purpose of securing the passage of legislation, I believe that it was improper and that it should occasion profound regret throughout the country. And if the magazine to which the Senator refers sought by the advocacy of the legislation to secure financial advantage in the form of reduced postal rates, its conduct was most reprehensible and calls for condemnation from all honest men. If other newspapers were parties to any arrangement by the terms of which they were to advocate legislation for the relief of postal employees, in consideration of which the latter were to use their influence to procure legislation beneficial to the newspapers, they have been guilty of an immoral act for which there is no extenuation. If the facts are as stated by the Senator from Colorado, it makes an ugly page in contemporaneous history.

The American people have been justly proud of the record made by the press of this country. In the pre-Revolutionary days as well as since the liberties of the American people have been ably defended by the press. Some of the greatest men of our country have been editors, and their pens have been dipped in fire, as they have led the people in mighty contests to secure political reforms, and moral victories. The press has been the bulwark of American freedom. We pronounce with reverence the illustrious names of Franklin and Greely and Bowles and Dana and Grady and Watterson and the hundreds of others who have made glorious the press of our land, and who with knightly courage have borne the torch of intellectual liberty and social justice to guide the people in the days of peace as well as in the hours of national peril.

We remember the words of Jefferson when he stated that he would rather live in a country that had no government and had newspapers, than in one where there was a government but no newspapers. He recognized the value of the press and regarded it as indispensable to liberty and progress. Unfortunately some newspapers exist only to advocate special interests or class legislation. Others are the personal organs of individuals who seek political preferment or have financial or other interests which they desire to protect. There are newspapers which are partisan and bigoted, and only intrested in the success of political organizations. The merits of political questions or the ethical principles involved are wholly without interest and receive no consideration.

Fortunate indeed is the country which possesses an independent and honest press. As long as we have men to lead us who have courage and sincerity and honesty, men who love their country and have an abiding faith in its destiny, and who believe that justice and righteousness will ultimately prevail throughout the world, our country will be safe. The American people desire the truth. They want good government. They have faith in the political principles upon which this Nation is founded. They may be misled for a time and be betrayed in an evil hour, and their feet may depart under the direction of false leaders from the paths of safety, but ultimately they will find themselves, and guided by the spirit of Washington and Jefferson and those who have preserved and glorified this Nation, they will support and defend the Constitution of the United States and rescue it and the institutions of our land from all enemies, whether foreign or domestic.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to amend the amendment by striking out all of those paragraphs which give or grant pensions to men who served less than 90 days.

There are 65 in this category. I presume I will have to state them for the RECORD, though it will take some time, I will say to the Senator, to call attention to each of the items.

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume, Mr. President, that a motion could be made to strike out all of those items, and that then the Secretary, with the assistance of the Senator from Utah, could determine which ones fall under the motion. We could dispose of the question very much quicker, of course, in that way.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that I have numbered each item in the bill, treating it as a paragraph, the last item being 680.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah may send his amendment to the desk in order that it may appear in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I will state that the items I move to strike out are numbered 6, 7, 15, 48, 84, 94, 101, 109, 117, 118, 127, 140, 151, 160, 163, 183, 198, 203, 212, 219, 225, 251, 252, 265, 272, 276, 289, 302, 313, 318, 326, 329, 335, 337, 338, 353, 360, 361, 362, 364, 368, 370, 420, 441, 472, 475, 480, 482, 518, 531, 542, 549, 557, 564, 574, 584, 597, 603, 605, 607, and 628.

Those are the numbers, Mr. President, which constitute the amendment as I have indicated them upon the printed bill now upon the desk of the Secretary and upon the desks of Senators, so that it is very easy by looking at the copy of the bill which I have, and which I have numbered, to determine the items which are embraced in my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senator may present his amendment to the committee amendment as he has thus indicated it.

Mr. KING. Let me state, in order that Senators may understand what my motion is, that the present law fixes 90 days as the minimum service to entitle a soldier to a service pension. There are 65 items in the bill in which pensions are granted for a service of less than 90 days. My motion is to strike from the bill all of those items granting pensions for less than 90 days' service, because it proposes a departure from existing law; it is unfair and discriminatory, and it will establish a precedent which in the end will be utilized to secure service pensions for everyone who was enrolled in the Army or the Navy, though he served but for one day or for one hour, if his name appeared upon the rolls. That will be the result of the enactment of this bill, and it seems to me that no one can defend a departure from the existing law when the precedent to be established portends such serious consequences.

The amendment of Mr. KING to the amendment reported by the committee is as follows:

On page 59, after line 21, to strike out:

"The name of Henry Seebers, late unassigned, Eleventh Regiment Maryland Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month."

"The name of Emiline Hartley, widow of James R. Hartley, late of Company C, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $30 per month."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall boil down what I desire to say in answer to the argument of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] in not to exceed three minutes of time. I can give a reason which the Senator undoubtedly has not fully considered why in certain cases it is perfectly proper to include in a special pension bill those who may have served less than 90 days.

I wish first to present to the Senate facts showing exactly what this pension bill involves. It will be recalled that the other House has been passing private pensions since last September. Those bills have come to the Senate, but we have held them in abeyance until, as the Senator from Utah has suggested, they embrace about 2,900 names, or about 3,000 altogether in the House bills. Most of those bills were passed in the House before the Fuller bill was presented to the Senate and before the Fuller bill was even passed by the House. Then, there were a number of Senate bills. It was quite certain that the Fuller bill would pass both Houses, and I therefore, on my own motion, asked that all of the special pension bills be laid aside until we should have disposed of the Fuller bill. Having disposed of the Fuller bill, we then took one of the House bills and amended it by striking out all after the enacting clause, and then inserting in lieu of the portion stricken out the names of all of those out of the three thousand or thirty-five hundred in both Senate and House bills who would not be taken care of by the Fuller pension bill. So we have practically a year of pension bills all crowded into this single omnibus bill. It is not, however, nearly as vital, I think, as the Senator from Utah would indicate it to be.

As the Senator has stated, the bill contains the names of 680 pensioners, and 379 of those cases provide for a pension of $30 a month for widows who otherwise would not be pensionable under the general law. In 160 cases a pension of $20 per month has been recommended. Those items are intended to pension helpless and dependent children of soldiers independently of the parents; that is, where the beneficiaries are orphans.

In 86 cases a pension of $35 per month is recommended. Those cases cover widows who are now receiving $30 per month under existing laws, who are over the age of 75 years, and require the constant aid and attention of other persons.

In 38 cases $40 per month is granted. Those items cover the cases of widows who have one minor child to support; and I think a careful examination will elicit the fact that the child is perfectly helpless, either mentally or physically. Where the case simply involves a minor child, of course, the extra pension of $10 a month will cease when the child becomes 16 years of age.

There are 17 cases where $50 per month is granted. This class covers the cases of widows who have two minor children to support, and also a few soldiers who can not get that rate under existing law.

There are four cases where $72 per month is granted. They are cases in which the soldier rendered long and faithful service and is now absolutely helpless and requires the constant aid and attention of another person, as, for instance, where the soldier is paralyzed. I recall one case among this number where there is not only complete paralysis but also where the soldier is dying from stomach cancer and can not last longer than a few weeks.

There are two cases where $24 a month is granted.

After all these cases are included, what is the proposed legislation going to cost the Government? If all the beneficiaries live for a single year the amount added to the pension roll will be $182,760, which is rather a mere bagatelle compared with the sums which we are almost daily voting; but as, according to present statistics, about one-half of those to whom we grant private pensions die within one year, the total expenditure involved will not amount to more than half the sum I have named. So the Treasury is not going to be looted to any great extent by taking care of the old soldiers and their widows covered by the pending bill.

Mr. President, I wish now to answer very briefly the objections upon which the pending motion of the Senator from Utah is based. He says that it has been the inflexible rule to grant no pension to a soldier who has served for less than 90 days. In that the Senator is mistaken. If a soldier incurred a disability, although he may not have served three days, he has a pensionable status. If the Senator will carefully examine the items included in this bill, I think he will find, if not in every instance, at least in nearly every instance, that the cases covered are those of soldiers who have a pensionable status, although they served less than 90 days, but are not pensionable at the rate provided in the various items. Suppose a soldier 65 or 68 years of age who served 60 days was wounded in battle, and has been drawing a pension during all of the ensuing time for that wound, but his pension will not be $72 per month. Now, let us suppose that he is suffering from total paralysis and needs the constant aid and attention of another person. In that event he is granted an additional pension because of the necessity for aid and attention. His case is not covered by the general law, but it will be covered by this bill. So the objection which the Senator from Utah urges, that these items should not be included in the pending bill, because they relate to soldiers who were not in battle, did not incur any disability, and served for less than 90 days, is untenable and arises from an erroneous understanding of the cases.

Now, in regard to the widows, I think if the Senator will examine the record very carefully he will find that the facts justify the recommendation of the committee. Take, for instance, the case of a man who was a good soldier, who fought for the preservation of the life of his country, and because of whose valor and suffering we have a United States of America to-day. He was possibly married during the war or very shortly thereafter. He died a few years ago, leaving a widow old and helpless. She was a pretty good wife to the soldier, possibly during many long years, perhaps even during the time of his service. Being helpless and old, she did not want to go to the poorhouse, but felt that, perhaps, by marrying some man he might give her a good home, so that she could live the remainder of her allotted life in peace. To get married after 75 years of age, or even 60, I think is hardly the thing to do; but old ladies are liable to make mistakes, and I am willing to forgive them under the circumstances if they did not make a good marriage after they were 60 or 70 years of age, and I am ready, in honor of this old soldier who kept the flag of his country flying through the dark days of 1861 to 1865, to take her back and give her a pension, even though she married once or twice or thrice. Of course, she was foolish to do so, but when people get in their dotage I forgive them a great many things that I would not forgive if they were young people in the vigor of manhood and womanhood; and a close examination of these cases will show that we have not been unjust in granting the little stipend to a widow who made a mistake in thinking that she could get married after she got to be an old woman and that the marriage would be a happy and a pleasant one. She made a mistake; maybe she got a divorce; and if she did, and is now penniless, I want to help her out because of the love and the gratitude I have toward the old soldier who saved this country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand from the Senator that all of the widows who are cared for in this bill are over 70 or 75 years of age?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; some of them are younger and were foolish enough to get married when they were 60 years of age.

Mr. THOMAS. Some were younger than that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; perhaps some of them were 55 years of age. There were not many of them. They are mostly old women, however, and each case was considered upon its own merits.

Now, we are not making an exception to the rule. Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that the law to-day is that it does not make any difference whether the widow is married once or thrice or a dozen times; upon the death of her last spouse, or upon her divorce, she is put back upon the pension roll under the present law. Therefore we are not changing that law.

Mr. THOMAS. That was the act of 1916.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the act of 1920, the Fuller bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; the act of 1916, just before the last presidential election.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; and reiterated in the act of 1920. I was not in favor of it myself.

Now the case of the undivorced: A great many of these cases—I will not say how many now—are put upon the pension roll because they could not secure their pensions at the department. Why? Because the records showed that the husband had been married once, and they could not go back and find the proof that he got a divorce. Possibly the woman had lived with that soldier for 20 or 30 or 40 years, believing that he was divorced, and probably he was divorced in some court in which the record is gone, or he thought he was divorced, at least, and she thought the same thing. You can not always prove those cases. Some of them had trouble in proving the fact that they were the widows of the soldiers. They could not get a certificate. They were married by some justice of the peace, possibly, out in the country, and it was hard to get the records; the witnesses had died, and they had trouble in establishing even the marriage, and their continuance of living with the soldier long enough at least to call it a common-law marriage.

Those cases have been carefully considered; and remember that we have cut out the vast majority of the cases that came to us. The Senator thinks we have been liberal, and I agree that more than 10,000 bills have been introduced in the House, and we have cut them down finally, both House and Senate bills, to 682.

There are a few of those cases, I think, where the marriage was later than 1905. There was some good reason in each instance why the committees of both the House and the Senate thought that we ought to grant a pension, even though it reached beyond 1905, in these special cases. Remember, the House passed the bill fixing the year at 1915. We cut it down to 1905, the old law, I will admit, under the expectation that probably we would agree on about 1910 in conference; but the House did not want to take the chance of a conference on the bill, fearing that they might not get it through in time. Therefore they accepted the amendment, the chairman of the committee stating that they would want to take care by special bill of those cases that would come in at least under 1910. I think that should be changed, as the Senator says, by a general law; but we have not followed that rule altogether in our past legislation. We have considered each case, and if the marriage ran but a short time beyond the period fixed by law we have sometimes overlooked it and granted a pension because of some other merits that were in the case.

Mr. President, I think this covers generally the objections that have been urged.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

There being no objection, the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 1, 1920, at 10 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATION.

Executive nomination received by the Senate May 31 (legislative day of May 24), 1920.

SOLICITOR GENERAL.

William L. Frierson, of Chattanooga, Tenn. (now Assistant Attorney General), to be Solicitor General, vice Alexander C. King, appointed circuit judge.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 31, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers and our God, whose judgments are true and righteous altogether, we stand in Thy sacred presence on this holy day, with gratitude welling up in our hearts for Thee and for the brave and gallant men who gave the last full measure of devotion to the Nation they loved and which every true American loves, that it should not perish from the earth.

We bless Thee that patriotism lives and will weave garlands of flowers, tablets of roses, to strew over the silent graves of those whose tents are pitched on "fame's eternal camping ground." Long may their memories live and their deeds inspire our newborn sons with patriotic fire for liberty, freedom, justice, and truth.

So may our Government live and bear the fruits of freedom while time shall last and the Stars and Stripes of Old Glory live on forever. In the spirit of the World's Greatest Patriot who died a martyr to truth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12272. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921; and

H. R. 12775. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice.

ADDRESS ON LINCOLN AND GRANT.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor yesterday to deliver an address on Lincoln and Grant in the rotunda of the Capitol. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my remarks by publishing that address in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address that he gave yesterday in the rotunda of the Capitol on Lincoln and Grant. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON THE NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I present for printing under the rule a conference report on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 13108. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. MADDEN. Some time since I received a letter from a man in Chicago by the name of Margolis, making charges against the Public Health Service. The result was an investigation. I have the report of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and I would like to have it go into the RECORD. I would also like to explain the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this Margolis the bolshevistic, anarchistic Margolis of Pittsburgh?

Mr. MADDEN. No; he is a Chicago man. As a matter of justice to the Public Health Service, I want to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] does not seem to be on his job and has not been for a week. There are thousands of letters like this that they wish to put in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a report from the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; and I make a complaint to the Surgeon General, and he writes me a letter, and, as I say, there are thousands. I am not going to object to this one, but I do call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming and the gentleman from Massachusetts that if we put one of these in the RECORD, everybody else will want to put his letter in.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say that I think it would be unfair to the office of the Surgeon General not to give a history of this investigation, in view of the charges that have been made.

Mr. GARNER. What investigation by the Public Health Service? Nothing but a letter.

Mr. MADDEN. It was an investigation made by the Surgeon General's office, and this is a report of the result of that investigation.

Mr. GARNER. When did this man prefer the charges?

Mr. MADDEN. A couple of months ago.

Mr. GARNER. How did he make the charges?

Mr. MADDEN. By letter. It was taken up on the floor of the House, and they are published in the RECORD. I think it is only fair to have the other side of the case appear in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, some time ago a man by the name of H. J. Margolis, of Chicago, representing himself as associated with an organization called the Service Men's Union of Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines Organization, wrote a letter complaining about the treatment of ex-service men in the hospitals under the conduct of the Public Health Service, and he cited specific cases of injustice done to those men.

After I took that matter up on the floor of the House the succeeding day the Surgeon General called at my office. He said that he would make a thorough investigation. He appointed his chief inspector, who went to the hospital referred to, made a thorough investigation of each case complained of, and the report of his findings is embodied in the paper I hold in my hand.

I wish to say in this connection that the result of the investigation seems to indicate that the charges made by Mr. Margolis were not well founded, and it is because of my desire to do justice to the office of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service that I rise in my place this morning and say what I have said and ask unanimous consent that the report of the Surgeon General's office in respect to all these cases may be made a part of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to insert the report in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF THE PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, May 11, 1920.

THE SURGEON GENERAL,
United States Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following synopsis from a report made by Senior Surg. (Reserve) Terriberry, the full report being now in your hands, on the letter of H. J. Margolis, of Chcago, dated April 1, and quoted by Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN and published as a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 6, 1920.

Every individual who was quoted as having been the victim of neglect or ill-treatment was interviewed, together with many witnesses who were disinterested, and Senior Surg. Terriberry elicited the following facts:

1. The Margolis letter is written so as to produce an impression discrediting the service and its officers in Chicago, and at the same time to escape legal responsibility for statements not in accordance with fact. Except in the case of Hyman Margolis, the charges are indirect and based on hearsay.

2. Francisco Isaia, alleged discharged from hospital penniless and unable to work, has been receiving compensation, including back pay, at $80 per month since his discharge from the Army; now in a period of quiescence while awaiting a secondary operation; was unable to get light work, therefore remained in hospital and says he has no complaint to make against the service or any of its officers.

3. Joseph Romano, alleged to be discharged after a serious operation and before cured; suffered from a sprained thumb. War Risk Bureau unable to connect this entry with his military service, but he was operated on March 18; made a normal recovery and was discharged on April 1; was not in receipt of compensation because he was not entitled to it. The operation was for varicocele, not in line of duty.

4. William E. Schmidt, charged to be the victim of professional malpractice; shown on investigation to be the victim of delayed development and hypochondriasis; was carefully examined and carefully treated; even has his meals served to him in bed, although there was nothing the matter with him except his congenital deficiencies. Dr. Hamill, the expert in this line, testified that he was a man of retarded development and constitutional mental inferiority.

5. Arthur Shoven, alleged to be the victim of malpractice in that his wounds after operation were not properly dressed, says himself that he has never made a statement such as was attributed to him by Margolis; that he received constant attention from the time he entered the hospital, and has no complaint to make against the hospital or anybody in it.

6. Flory S. Flowers, alleged to be the victim of neglect by the medical officers; shown in Army records to have been treated for bladder trouble not in line of duty; no evidence obtained to date showing this man's present ailment connected with his service in the Army; was found to be suffering from cataract of the right eye, which he claimed resulted from a boxing match in the service. There was unavoidable delay of two months in securing glasses not chargeable to the marine hospital authority, as glasses are provided by the War Risk Insurance Bureau under the law, and this man is not a beneficiary. He is now employed in the hospital itself as an orderly, being paid $60 per month and his maintenance; prima facie evidence that he has no cause of complaint.

7. Joe Vacarro, charged to have been neglected by the medical officers. No evidence to show that his disability, which he claimed was from trouble with his back, had any connection with his Army service, and he is therefore not in receipt of compensation. While at the hospital he received treatment for his eyes, his tonsils, and for venereal disease, and is recorded as cured; testifies that he has "always been nervous," and is manifestly a case of neurasthenia. He is also employed as an orderly, doing light work, and is receiving $60 per month as an employee.

8. Hyman Margolis, alleged victim of professional maltreatment and premature discharge from the hospital, with neglect on the part of medical officers, has nothing to substantiate his claim that his ailments are in any way connected with his Army service. Dr. Ridlon and Dr. Ryerson, both famous surgeons, testify that they do not believe his bunions were caused by standing in mud and water, but by shoes and stockings either too tight or too short. He is not in receipt of compensation for the reason above alleged, and, although this matter is outside the responsibilities of the Public Health Service, it is only fair to state it. Although not entitled, he was nevertheless operated on by Dr. Ryerson on February 20, and made an uneventful recovery, and was supplied a pair of shoes by the Red Cross, which he refused to wear. He refused to leave the ward and go to the dining room for his meals, claiming inability to do so, although able to go out of the hospital on pass at this time for two days. He was not discharged until after examination by Dr. John Ridlon, orthopedic consultant, who testified that he examined Margolis on March 29, and found the incision healed, and advised Margolis to use his feet, as in private practice such cases are made to walk much earlier than was Margolis as a part of the treatment itself. Margolis was ordered to be discharged from the hospital, and refused to go, and was finally ejected by the police.

H. J. Margolis, the brother of this man and the writer of the complaint, was called into the investigation, and testimony shows that he said he would have "Cobb (J. O. Cobb, the commanding officer) thrown out on his neck, and everybody else in the hospital, and would tear the place up from roof to cellar." He said he represented a soldier and sailor organization and various newspapers, and that his influence would enable him to carry out his threats. Testimony shows that Margolis was sufficiently cured at the time of his ejection to warrant action in discharging him without harm to himself or anybody else.

9. Charles H. Decker, alleged to have been discharged from the hospital, to his harm and detriment. This case was investigated by myself on March 3, 1920, and that the man's own statement, submitted and signed by himself, is to the effect that he had been treated in a kindly and courteous manner; that his teeth had been efficiently cared for; that, despite the fact that he had stated to his Congressman that he was neglected and had not been examined, evidence is on file to show that X-ray pictures were taken as follows: One of his head, one of his shoulder, two of his lungs, two of his teeth, three or four of his abdomen, and stomach tests to the number of three were made, and every decayed tooth in his head but one, which was then in the process of treatment, had been fully treated.

10. Eva Beukinga, reported as charging Dr. Cobb, the commanding officer, with disrespectful language toward the Congress of the United States. The facts are that this woman represented herself alternately as a representative of the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., was disavowed by both organizations, and Dr. Cobb testifies that he has never seen her. It is presumable that an officer with 33 years of service to his credit would hardly be so indiscreet and disloyal as to be guilty of the charge, which is based entirely upon the unsupported testimony of this woman, who conducts a small candy and tobacco store, and whose veracity, as above shown, is impeached by both the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A.

11. Suicide in hospital: The statement is made in the Margolis letter that a suicide occurred in the hospital and that rumors are that he committed suicide because during the week he was in the hospital he got no treatment and was in terrible pain. The facts, amply substantiated by testimony, are that the suicide in question, Thomas B. Delicate, was brought to the hospital by the police on March 5; was sent by a nurse at his own request to a bathroom to wash up, and a few minutes later, on hearing peculiar noises in the bathroom, the door was forced open and Delicate was seen over the bathtub hacking at his throat with a razor blade. He was immediately taken to the operating room, but died on the table. He was in the hospital less than one and one-half hours when he died.

CONCLUSIONS.

From the above charges, amply substantiated by sworn testimony submitted in the full report, it is easily seen that no one of the above charges can be sustained.

Respectfully,

J. H. WHITE,
Assistant Surgeon General.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON THE BONUS BILL.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have the privilege of extending their remarks in the RECORD for three legislative days on the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have three legislative days to extend remarks on the bonus bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I appreciate that it is customary at the end of a session to grant general leave to extend remarks in the RECORD, but that general leave is invariably abused. Now, unless this request, if it is granted, can be restricted to the Members' own remarks, without resolutions or letters or poems or songs or editorials or any of these extraneous matters, I am going to object. If the gentleman will permit Members to give their own views, confining it to their own remarks on the bonus bill, I will not object.

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present.

Mr. KING. At the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I will withdraw that.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. COLE] is absent on business connected with the Committee on Indian Affairs. Had he been present Saturday and had the opportunity he would have voted "aye" on the bonus bill.

PURCHASE OF CAVALRY HORSES.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute upon the subject of the Army foolishly buying unnecessary Cavalry horses in peace times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the San Angelo Standard published last Friday and other newspapers published in Texas advised that Army agents from Fort Reno and Oklahoma City were buying Cavalry horses for the Government and had recently purchased 150 such horses. Has this Congress authorized the Army to buy horses indiscriminately over the western portion of Texas in peace time? I think it is outrageous for the War Department at this time to continue buying unnecessary horses when we have a surplus of horses in the Army now, and I think that the best thing this Congress can do before we adjourn is, through the proper committee, to bring in a resolution directing the War Department to cease buying horses in time of peace.

Mr. DYER. Why does not the gentleman ask the Secretary of War to stop that?

Mr. BLANTON. We do not have to pass the buck. We have authority here to stop it ourselves. All we have to do is to command the Secretary of War to cease.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the war-risk insurance act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the development of our merchant marine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request, and accept the suggestions and reservations made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does not the gentleman from Michigan think it rather remarkable on a bill where only 40 minutes of debate was had, to permit the RECORD to be lumbered up with a hundred or more alleged speeches made on the subject?

Mr. MCARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the par check clearing system.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I couple with that a request to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the same subject?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] to so extend their remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon legislation affecting the West, principally public-land legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the agricultural situation in the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which state?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is only one state.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which Union, ours or Mr. Gompers's?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The old one. Some of us have been in all of the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, what is the request as stated by the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the state of the Union. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman was in the House when I objected to any extension of remarks upon the bonus bill. I presume the extension he has in mind does not include the bonus bill?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no; it had no reference to the bonus bill. I think the less said about the bonus bill the better. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEES IN ENROLLING ROOM.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until and including June 5, 1920, not exceeding the sum of $100, for the employment of such additional clerical and messenger service as may be necessary in the enrolling room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the resolution is usual at the close of a session, in order to make the necessary provision for additional assistance in the enrolling room.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we were all cheered this morning by the reappearance on the floor of the House of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. [Applause.] We are delighted to have him once more with us, and we all join in the hope for his complete restoration to health. [Applause.] We welcome him back to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on the river and harbor bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I must object.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 11892, the river and harbor appropriation bill, and I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the conference report on the river and harbor bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement was read.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 11, 15, 18, 20, 24, 26, 27, 32, 40, 43, 57, and 65.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 12, 14, 16, 17, 19, 21, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 35, 37, 38, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 58, 59, 60, 62, and 63, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with its insertion on page 10, after line 16; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Charlotte Harbor, Fla., with a view to securing a channel of suitable dimensions to Punta Gorda."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Harbor at St. Petersburg, Fla."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"Tennessee River and tributaries, in North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment strike out the word "Pollocksville," in line 4, insert in lieu thereof the word "Polloksville," and transfer the item so amended to page 5, after line 5; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of the amendment strike out the word "deep" and insert in lieu thereof the word "depth," and in line 18 of the amendment strike out the word "Ceritor" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Cerritos"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "with a view to"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 55: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 55, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 7 of the proposed amendment strike out the word "appropriation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 7 and 8 of the proposed amendment strike out the word "appropriation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 61: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. That the laws of the United States relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors, passed between March 4, 1913, until and including the laws of the third session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, shall be compiled under the direction of the Secretary of War and printed as a document, and that 600 additional copies shall be printed for the use of the War Department."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 64: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the proposed amendment strike out the word "appropriation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have been unable to agree on the amendment of the Senate numbered 1.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon:

The rivers and harbors bill as it passed the House carried cash appropriations in the sum of $12,400,000. The amount added by amendment in the Senate was $12,000,000, making the total amount carried by the bill as it passed the Senate $24,400,000. As a result of the conference, the amount involved in the Senate amendments has not been changed, no agreement having been reached by the committee of conference on amendment No. 1, the only amendment proposing a change in the amount appropriated by the House.

The following statement shows the action taken by the conference on each of the Senate amendments (page numbers refer to print of bill with Senate amendments numbered):

On amendment No. 1, page 1: Item increases amount appropriated by House for maintenance and improvement of such river and harbor works heretofore authorized as may be most desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation from $12,000,000 to $24,000,000. The committee of conference have been unable to agree on this amendment.

On amendment No. 2, page 2: Item strikes out proviso in House bill directing that of the $12,000,000 appropriated for improvement and maintenance of works heretofore authorized $5,000,000 shall be expended for maintenance work and $7,000,000 for improvement work. House conferees recede. In the hearings before the Senate committee it developed that possibly more than $5,000,000 would be required for maintenance; that if left in the House form a double set of accounts would have to be kept with the Treasury Department, involving additional clerical work; and on a number of the projects it is difficult to discern between maintenance and improvement work.

On amendment No. 3, page 3: Item inserts the following paragraph to section of bill providing for examinations and surveys:

"Every report submitted to Congress in pursuance of this section or of any provision of law for a survey hereafter enacted, in addition to other information which the Congress has heretofore directed shall be given, shall contain a statement of special or local benefit which will accrue to localities affected by such improvement and a statement of general or national benefits, with recommendations as to what local cooperation should be required, if any, on account of such special or local benefit."

House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 4, page 3: Survey of Camden Harbor, Me. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 5, page 4: Survey of South Bay, Boston Harbor, Mass. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 6: Item transfers House provision, which was misplaced. (See amendment No. 38, p. 11.) House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 7, page 4: Survey of Delaware River from Trenton, N. J., to Easton, Pa. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 8, page 4: Survey of Woodbridge Creek, N. J. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 9, page 5: Item amends House provision for survey of Raritan River, N. J., by striking out the words "including that section above the Washington Canal." House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 10, page 5: Senate amendment amends provisos in items in river and harbor acts of 1910 and 1911 appropriating for the improvement of St. Jones River, Del. The effect of this amendment would be to allow work to proceed on the excavation of any single cut-off when the land for that cut-off is transferred to the United States free of cost, instead of delaying the prosecution of the improvement until the land required for the 16 cut-offs covered by the project is furnished free of cost by local interests. It also eliminates the following language from the items in the acts of 1910 and 1911 above referred to: "and the United States shall have been released from all claims for damages arising from the proposed diversion of the stream." House conferees recede with an amendment transferring the item to section 4 of the bill.

On amendment No. 11, page 5: Survey of lower 2 miles of Northwest River, N. C. and Va. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 12, page 6: Survey of Warwick River, Va. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 13, page 6: Survey of Starlings Creek, Accomac County, Va., and channel connecting said creek with Pocomoke Sound. House conferees recede with verbal amendment.

On amendment No. 14, page 6: Survey of channel leading from Oyster, Va., to Atlantic Ocean. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 15, page 6: Survey of channel connecting York River, Va., with Back Creek. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 16, page 6: Survey of Carters Creek, Lancaster County, Va. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 17, page 6: Survey of Morattico Creek, Lancaster County, Va. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 18, page 6: Item amends House provision for survey of Savannah harbor by extending the area over which survey is to be made about 4½ miles up the Savannah River to Drakies Cut. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 19, page 7: Survey of St. Marks River, Wakulla County, Fla. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 20, page 7: Survey of Charlotte harbor channel, South Boca Grande, Fla. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 21, page 7: Survey of narrows between Choctawhatchee Bar and Santa Rosa Sound, Fla., including the swash channel from Camp Walton to Mary Esther. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 22, page 7: Survey of Charlotte Harbor to Punta Gorda with a view to increasing the dimensions of the channel from Punta Gorda to the Gulf, including Boca Grande Channel. House conferees recede with an amendment confining the survey to the channel leading to Punta Gorda.

On amendment No. 23, page 7: Survey of St. Petersburg Harbor, Fla., and to deep water in Tampa Bay, with a view to increasing the dimensions of the channel and existing project from the docks to deep water in the bay. House conferees recede with an amendment making the item read as follows: "Harbor at St. Petersburg, Fla."

On amendment No. 24, page 7: To the House item providing a survey of "St. Johns River, Fla., from Jacksonville to the ocean," the Senate amendment adds the following: "and St. Johns River from Lake Harney to Indian River to create a navigable waterway from St. Johns River to Indian River." Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 25, page 7: Senate amendment adds word "Florida" to House item providing survey of Apalachicola Bay, Fla. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 26, page 8: Item provides survey for Apalachicola River, at Apalachicola, Fla., and Apalachicola Bay, Fla. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 27, page 8: Survey with a view to reporting whether the existing project provides sufficient depths to enable the deepest draft ships of the regular lines calling at Brunswick Harbor, Ga., to reach their docks without being delayed by waiting for the tide or using two tides to enter or leave the harbor; and, if adequate depths are not provided by the existing project, whether sufficient depths would be provided by the larger of the two projects reported in House Document No. 393, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 28, page 8: Survey of Gulfport Harbor and Ship Island Pass, Miss. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 29, page 8: Survey of Mississippi River, La., with a view to securing an outlet to the Gulf of Mexico by the most practical route for a permanent channel of a depth not exceeding 35 feet. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 30, page 8: Survey of Tensas River, La. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 31, page 8: Survey of Galveston Channel, Tex. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 32, page 9: Strikes out House item providing that a preliminary examination and survey shall be made of the "coast of Texas in the vicinity of Aransas Pass, Port Aransas, Corpus Christi, and Rockport, with a view to the establishment of a safe and adequate harbor," and inserts in lieu thereof an item directing that a survey of these localities shall be made by a board of engineers with a view to the establishment of a safe and adequate harbor or harbors, including protection against storms and erosions and the protection of the instrumentalities and aids of commerce located there. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 33, page 9: Survey of La Grue River, Ark. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 34, page 9: Survey of Tennessee River, Tenn., Ala., and Ky. House conferees recede with an amendment making the item read: "Tennessee River and tributaries, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, and Kentucky."

On amendment No. 35, page 10: Survey of outlet of Cass Lake, Minn., with a view of securing a navigable connection with the Mississippi River. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 36, page 10: Survey of Neuse and Trent Rivers, N. C. House conferees recede with amendment making slight verbal change.

On amendment No. 37, page 10: Survey of south fork of Kentucky River, Ky. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 38, page 11: Transfer item inserted by the House to page 4 of bill. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 39, page 11: House provision which ordered a survey of Los Angeles and Long Beach Harbors, Calif., is amended so as to provide for a preliminary examination and survey. House conferees recede with amendment correcting two typographical errors.

On amendment No. 41, page 13: Survey of Tualatin River, Oreg. House conferees recede.

On amendments Nos. 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, and 47, pages 13 and 14: Items make slight verbal changes to House provisions for surveys. House conferees recede with slight verbal changes in Nos. 42 and 43.

On amendment No. 48, page 14: Survey of Wrangell Harbor, Alaska. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 49, page 14: Survey of harbor of Christiansted, St. Croix, Virgil Islands. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 50, page 15: Item amends House bill by combining sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 into one section (sec. 4). House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 51, page 15: Item amends House provision authorizing the Secretary of War to credit local interests in the vicinity of Yaquina Bay and Harbor, Oreg. (in requiring compliance with the conditions precedent to the prosecution of the project adopted in the river and harbor act approved Mar. 2, 1919), with the cost of work done by them which conforms to the project plans, by directing that credit shall be given at the present cost of doing the work which has been done. The act of 1919 required that local interests should pay half the cost of the work adopted, or $418,000. Under a permit from the Secretary of War and under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, the local interests had commenced work on the project and had expended, up to June 30, 1919, the sum of $133,976. House conferees recede.

On amendments Nos. 52, 53, and 54, pages 15 and 16, strike out section numbers. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 55, page 16: Transfers section 9 of House bill, at bottom of page 17, to section 4 of bill as amended by Senate. House conferees recede with slight verbal change.

On amendment No. 56, page 16: Item provides that the sum of $71,775, when deposited in the Treasury by local interests, shall be accepted by the Secretary of War as the total cash contribution required under the provision in the river and harbor act approved July 27, 1916, adopting a new project for the improvement of Willapa Harbor and River, Wash. Under the condition referred to local interests were required to pay half the cost, which was estimated to be $71,775. Due to increase in cost of doing the work contemplated the sum mentioned will not pay half the cost of completing the work at this time. The effect of the amendment will be to relieve local interests of the necessity of making further contribution toward the prosecution of the work covered by this project. House conferees recede with slight verbal change.

On amendment No. 57, page 17: Item provides that the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, in requiring compliance with the conditions precedent to the prosecution of the project adopted in the river and harbor act approved March 2, 1919, credit local interests with the cost of so much of the work performed by the city of Houston and the Harris County Houston ship channel navigation district in the construction of the turning basin and channel in the Houston ship channel, Tex., as conforms to the project plans and standards of the Government. Senate conferees recede.

On amendment No. 58, page 17: Item authorizes the transfer of dredge Cumberland from Fernandina Harbor, Fla., to Savannah Harbor, Ga., without charge. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 59, page 17: Changes section number. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 60, page 17: Strikes out section 9 of House bill. The language of the House section was reinserted by the Senate in section 4, amendment No. 55. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 61, page 18: Item provides for printing the laws relating to rivers and harbors passed between March 4, 1913, and March 4, 1921. House conferees recede with an amendment directing that the compilation shall be printed as a document and 600 additional copies shall be printed for the use of the War Department.

On amendment No. 62, page 18: Item provides that appropriations heretofore made or provided in this act for improvement work on rivers and harbors may be used for maintenance work whenever from any cause they may have become seriously impaired, but prohibits the diversion of funds from one project to another. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 63, page 18: Item authorizes the Secretary of War to transfer, free of charge, to the Chief of Engineers, for use in prosecuting civil works under his direction, such material, supplies, instruments, vehicles, machinery, or other equipment, pertaining to the Military Establishment as are or may hereafter be found to be surplus and no longer required for military purposes. House conferees recede.

On amendment No. 64, page 19: Item amends section 4 of the river and harbor act approved June 25, 1910, which authorizes the Secretary of War to adjust and settle all claims for damages by collision against vessels belonging to the United States, where the claim is not in excess of $500, if, in his judgment, after investigation, the claim is just, by authorizing the Secretary of War to settle, in like manner, whenever, in the prosecution of river and harbor works, an accident occurs, damaging or destroying property belonging to any person or corporation, and whenever personal property of employees of the United States who are employed on or in connection with river and harbor works is damaged or destroyed in connection with the loss, threatened loss, or damage to United States property, or through efforts to save life or to preserve United States property such claims as are found, in his judgment, to be just, and which do not exceed $500 in cost to the Government for a single claim. House conferees recede with slight verbal change.

On amendment No. 65, page 20: Item provides for transfer and sale of land which was made by the deposit of spoil in the prosecution of river improvement work at Alexandria, Va. The question as to whether the title to this land lies in the United States or the riparian owners is now involved in a friendly suit before the District Supreme Court. Senate conferees recede.

C. A. KENNEDY,
S. WALLACE DEMPSEY,
THOS. GALLAGHER,
Managers on the part of the House.

During the reading of the statement,

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad at this time to make an inquiry of the chairman with reference to an item, or shall I wait until the reading of the statement is finished?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will wait until the statement is finished.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the statement.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the Senate added 65 amendments to the House bill, and we reached an agreement on all the amendments except amendment No. 1, which raises the amount carried in the House bill from $12,000,000 to $24,000,000. Of these 65 amendments 31 were for surveys. The conferees on the part of the House agreed to all the amendments for surveys that came within the rule under which surveys are ordered by the Rivers and Harbors Committee, which is that they will not order a survey where an adverse report was made within four years. The Senate conferees receded from such survey amendments as did not come within the rule. All told, there were something like 10 legislative amendments. There is only one which affects the policy heretofore followed, and that is amendment No. 3. This amendment requires the engineers in reporting on surveys to make a statement as to what local or special benefits will accrue to localities affected by such improvements and recommend local cooperation if the facts warrant. The conferees thought that was a very good amendment to agree to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Col. Taylor in his testimony before the committee urgently recommended $42,000,000—I have the hearings before me. Along toward the latter part of his testimony he recommended $27,000,000 as the minimum. He based his recommendation upon the work that was to be done on surveys, maintenance, and other work, as mentioned in his reports. Now, I note from the hearings that he recommends $130,000 for Gulfport Harbor for maintenance and he recommends $60,000 for Pascagoula Harbor. I understand from Col. Taylor that if this appropriation is cut to $12,000,000 that it will be absolutely impossible to maintain those harbors. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to Pascagoula Harbor, that there has been for the last two years a large shipbuilding plant established there, employing several thousand men, also there are a large number of wooden-ship building plants, or have been there—most of them are being discontinued. Now, the Government has spent thousands and thousands of dollars upon this harbor. There is now a bar lying between Horn Island Pass and Pascagoula Harbor, or the Louisville & Nashville Railroad bridge, which, if removed, would give a 26-foot channel to the Gulf. Now, unless that harbor is improved, of course all the money that has been spent by the Government there will have been lost, unless Congress later on makes appropriation for it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. How does it happen the Government spent so much money at a point where there is no water?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman is very much mistaken about that.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if there is an adequate supply of water it would not be necessary to have the dredging to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The gentleman is mistaken about that. The hearings will show that at the mouth of the Pascagoula River there are 26 feet of water between the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co.'s line and Horn Island Pass, except a bar the Government is now working on.

The Government is now dredging that bar, cutting it out so that any ocean-going vessel can pass over it; but if this appropriation for this point is not increased, seagoing vessels carrying a heavy amount of tonnage can not pass over that bar, so I seriously urge on the committee to take this matter into consideration. Now, in respect to Gulfport Harbor, the appropriation recommended by Col. Taylor is $130,000. With a $12,000,000 appropriation for all the ports of the country, he does not see how this can be made. Of course, I appreciate there is a small sum remaining on hand—I believe he estimates about $12,000,000 to be distributed—but I call the attention of the chairman to the fact that these appropriations can not be used except for specific places mentioned in the bill. That is true, is it not, that this money can not be diverted except as the act of Congress specifies?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is money already appropriated for specific projects. But any of the money carried in this bill under the amendment agreed to permits the use of any of the $12,000,000 for improvement or maintenance work.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will just permit me to finish this, I hope the gentleman and his committee will see their way clear toward increasing the appropriation.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman we had this in our minds. We just discussed at one meeting the amount to be carried in the bill. The chairman of the Commerce Committee asked that he be permitted to take that amendment back to the Senate. He seemed to feel that he had misled the Senate by a statement he made on the floor. He evidently misunderstood what Col. Taylor said.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The chairman intends to ask for a further conference on amendment No. 1, which, I take it, is the only one in dispute, covering the amount of money to be appropriated.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes. When the proper time comes I shall ask that the House further insist on its disagreement to that amendment and send it back to conference.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that there are over $50,000,000 on hand still unexpended?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The report made by the Chief of Engineers on date of April 1 shows that on the 1st day of July there will be unexpended balances amounting to over $53,000,000 to carry the work of emergency river and harbor improvement for eight months, up to the 1st of March, 1921, without taking into consideration the amount carried in this bill.

Mr. SNELL. And if we appropriate $24,000,000 more it makes over $60,000,000 to be available next year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. It will mean that with the provisions of the House bill there will be over $65,000,000 to carry on the work of river and harbor improvement for eight months, or five times as much as was expended on all the projects during the last fiscal year.

Mr. SNELL. Under the present conditions of labor and material is it possible to spend more money than that during the coming year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Col. Taylor told me within the last three or four days that they hoped to be able to expend about $40,000,000 next year.

Mr. SNELL. You have more money appropriated now, to say nothing of the bill that passed the House, by $12,000,000 than they can possibly spend next year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then why should we increase the amount carried in the House bill?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. So far the Senate conferees have not convinced us it is needed.

Mr. SNELL. I hope that the House conferees will stick with great tenacity on the $12,000,000 in the present bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it not possible to give instructions to the conferees to that effect?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think we ought to be instructed.

Mr. TREADWAY. In reference to this $50,000,000 that is on hand, can it be changed from one project to another at the will of the engineers?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. No.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is limited to the projects for which it was appropriated?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. TREADWAY. But the $12,000,000 can be apportioned as the engineers see fit, where the needs of the service show it should be done?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is the case; and I will state, as I said when the bill was considered in the House, that I consider this $12,000,000 as an emergency proposition.

Mr. TREADWAY. At their discretion?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. I join the gentleman in thinking that the House conferees, if they do not desire further instruction from the House, should insist on keeping the item not to exceed the House appropriation of $12,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. JOHNSON] asked me what was the most that has ever been spent during a fiscal year. I will say that I think about $39,000,000 is the most that has ever been spent in one year in the history of the Government, and the amount we will have on hand under the House bill on the 1st of July will be more than twice that sum.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman state how much was expended last year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. A trifle over $21,000,000 in all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I want to call attention to this fact: As shown by Col. Taylor, the reason why more was not spent on these projects and more improvements made was on account of war conditions. Labor and coal will be an increased item, as Col. Taylor states in his report, and that ought to be taken into consideration. A few years ago the cost of coal and labor was a great deal less than it will be at this time.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the expenditures for this fiscal year, estimating for May and June, will amount to just about $30,000,000.

Mr. BAER. Is it not a fact that contracts are being made now at a cost of about 300 per cent more than normal?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Cost seems to be abnormal.

Mr. VARE. They were abnormal last year, and they are still abnormal, and would it not be a good business proposition not to go too hastily with large contracts during these abnormal times?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that Col. Taylor stated when before our committee he did not think it advisable to make continuing contracts at this time, because there is a strong probability that the cost of doing the work would be reduced.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What objection has the gentleman to the House instructing the conferees to vote for $24,000,000 instead of $12,000,000?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I have this objection, that I do not think it is needed.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. SWEET. How much of the $53,000,000 that you claim is now on hand is already contracted for to complete special projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that on April 1 about $27,000,000 was under contract or allotted. That means that on April 1 there was $27,000,000 in cash to pay for work under contract, to be done in the future.

Mr. SWEET. Extending over how long a time?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that there are eight projects where the contracts total in each case more than $500,000. But in most cases, where there is a million or two million under contract they are let out under several contracts; that is, the amount covers several contracts. So that as near as we can tell the whole amount under contract will not be expended up until March 4, 1921. On such projects as are estimated for in this bill, 49 of them, there will be about $5,000,000 of the amount under contract unexpended March 1, 1921.

Mr. SWEET. How much did your bill carry for maintenance and upkeep outside of the special projects that have been contracted for?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The lump-sum provision as amended by the Senate, and to which the House conferees agreed, provides that the entire $12,000,000 can be used for maintenance or improvement work on any project that is needed.

Mr. SWEET. And that is left to the discretion of the engineers?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is left to the discretion of the engineers, and under that provision they must use it where it is needed in the interest of commerce.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to my friend.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and that of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], expressing the hope that the conferees would insist upon the provision put in the House bill. I want to express the hope that the conferees will not take this instruction of these gentlemen as an instruction of the House to the conferees. The people of the Mississippi Valley are very much interested in this matter, and I am hoping that the conferees will approach the Senate conferees on this question with open minds and give it their most serious consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Without doubt that will be done.

Mr. MONDELL. If there is any doubt on that question, we will have that doubt settled right here, before this conference report goes back to the Senate.

Nine-tenths of the House know—practically everyone in the House knows—that every dollar is appropriated here that is necessary for any project in the country where there is water and commerce, and that another dollar added to the sum carried in the House bill is a dollar that is unnecessary and not needed and a waste of public money; and I am sure that the House will not stand for anything of that kind. And if it requires instruction to the conferees the House will give the instruction, and if instructions are not given—definite, binding instructions—it will be because the House believes that the Senate is prepared to recede, and that the conferees on the part of the House will insist on the Senate receding.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I will call the gentleman's [Mr. MONDELL] attention to the fact that there are no ports in the State of Wyoming, and if this were a reclamation scheme the gentleman would be in favor of expending every dollar in the Treasury.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from Wyoming is expressing his opinion about things as to which, I think, he has not full information, and I am not sure that we will do exactly what he states.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. We discussed it for a few moments, and at the request of the Senate conferees we let them take it back to the Senate. We passed on these other matters.

Mr. DENISON. I want to see a river and harbor bill enacted, but if the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming is to be insisted upon here we may not have any river and harbor bill whatever.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. The gentleman is aware, is he not, of the fact that Col. Taylor, in his testimony before the Commerce Committee of the Senate, said that he recommended $24,000,000 as being the irreducible minimum if these improvement projects were to receive the proper completion and the work is to be maintained.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think he qualified that statement before the House committee. He said that statement was based on the policy of the engineers to complete the existing projects without delay. He did not say that $24,000,000 was necessary in the interest of commerce.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I heard Col. Taylor's statement before the Commerce Committee of the Senate, and it was absolute, I think, that the $24,000,000 he regards as the irreducible minimum in order that the interests of the Government may be protected in the money already expended, and in order that the work may be conducted with anything like reasonable dispatch.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Col. Taylor wrote to the chairman of the committee that $18,000,000 was, in his judgment, the least amount with which they could meet the needs of commerce.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. He may have reduced the irreducible minimum, but I would like to ask the gentleman one other question.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I understand that the gentleman will not ask for positive instructions to-day?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I shall ask that the House further insist.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] made some reference as to what the attitude of the House might be. As I understand it, the vote of the House now stands for $12,000,000 as the appropriation. Now, I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that if there is any question about that being the limit of the amount the House desires to have go into the appropriation bill we had better instruct the conferees right now. But I yield to the superior judgment and wishes of the chairman of the committee, and the gentlemen who probably will be conferees with him, and will not ask for a vote instructing them at this time. I think, however, the House is in the attitude of being ready to pass such a vote if it felt that it was necessary in order to strengthen such support as the conferees desire to limit the amount to $12,000,000. I for one think it is ample, with the $50,000,000 already on hand, to do all that is necessary in these days of high prices; and I think, further, that as the matter now stands, the House conferees do not need an instruction to the effect that $12,000,000 is the amount that the House favors, and that we do not favor any more.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I hope that the conferees will not think that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is expressing the judgment of the House upon this matter. I know the wish of this House is that the amount shall not be less than the amount that the Senate authorized. I think we ought to have an ample amount, and if any instruction is necessary I think we could get instruction to adhere to the position of the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Notwithstanding the claim of the majority leader of the House [Mr. MONDELL] in regard to rivers and harbors, in which he said that every Member knew that the amount carried in this bill was as much or more than could be expended, I want to ask this question: The amount already appropriated for the Ohio River that will be available this year is over $4,000,000, is it not?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. No; over $9,000,000 is on hand. Between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 is tied up in contracts for work to be done in the future. There is between $4,000,000 and $5,000,000 allotted that the department can "pull back," if necessary.

Mr. KINCHELOE. In view of the fact that the Congress established several years ago the policy of a 9-foot stage in the Ohio River, which we all know if completed at the 9-foot stage would be as great an artery of commerce as there is in the world, and in view of the fact that the lowest dam that is now being constructed is only at Henderson, Ky., which I believe is about 165 miles from that point to the mouth of the Ohio, why could there not be more than this amount expended there in the year, when Congress pledged to the people along that river that the work would be speedily finished?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not know whether they have definitely determined as yet whether they would improve the lower reach of the river by the lock and dam system or by means of open-channel work. I do not know whether that is decided on or not; but in regard to the other question that the gentleman from Kentucky asked, Col. Taylor said they already had at work all the contractors that they could get to do that work. They could not get more bidders, because it requires an expensive plant that would be almost worthless after they had completed the contract.

Mr. KINCHELOE. You spoke of those two propositions. What other proposition could be invoked there, except locks and dams, to improve the navigation of the Ohio River? They certainly could not dredge it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. They have figured that they could probably dredge it cheaper from Henderson, Ky., down. The only difficulty that might arise by improving by open-channel work is that there might not be sufficient water in the Ohio River at certain periods of the year between Henderson, Ky., and the mouth of the Tennessee River to maintain the 9-foot channel. I think they will finally agree to improve it by the lock and dam system.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The question is, When are they going to decide that proposition?

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not also a fact that in addition to the $53,000,000, together with the $12,000,000 of new appropriations, the engineering department of the Government is confronted with a lack of dredges for the prosecution of this work, and that one of the great handicaps under which they are now laboring is to get dredges to do this work, which dredges it takes two or three years probably to build, some of them?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is true.

Mr. OGDEN. Can the gentleman state whether the unexpended balance for the Ohio River will be sufficient to continue these projects during the next fiscal year?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think there is any doubt about it. If I were asked my idea about it, I should say there would be a hold over of several million dollars on the 4th of March, 1921.

Mr. OGDEN. Is any part of the appropriation carried in this bill to be allotted for work on any of those projects?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That will be allotted in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War. They will allot this $12,000,000 where it is most needed in the interest of commerce.

Mr. OGDEN. It has not been indicated as to how it will be allotted?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Oh, no; and will not be, until after they have figured on it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman from Iowa will recall that in the last river and harbor appropriation bill, or perhaps the one before that, the Secretary of War was authorized to experiment with the open-channel work below Hendersonville with a view to determining whether a 9-foot stage could be maintained in the Ohio River in that way. Can the gentleman state what work has been done by the department in the way of experimentation on that proposition to determine whether that will be feasible?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that two years ago, in the river and harbor appropriation bill, we gave authority to the Secretary of War to modify the Ohio River project if he thought it was more desirable to improve that reach of the river by open-channel work.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman is mistaken about that. We did not go to the extent of authorizing him to modify it, but we authorized him to experiment with this modification and report back to Congress, so that Congress could determine whether it would eliminate those locks and dams in the lower river.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. I think we modified the project to the extent of permitting him to do that if it was more economical and desirable.

Mr. BARKLEY. We passed a provision that he must report back to Congress. I remember the colloquy which occurred at the time that the bill was amended in that way, when it was stated that if he reported back to Congress, and Congress did not authorize it, the project would go on as originally planned.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to know if anything has been done to demonstrate whether this modification can be put into effect on the lower river. My reason for asking that is that the longer the experiment is put off the longer will be the postponement of the construction of those locks and dams that are necessary to create this 9-foot channel in the lower river.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I did not suppose it required any experiment. I thought the Board of Engineers was going to pass on the proposition.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it is in the nature of an experiment. I think the result of it must be reported back to the Congress.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That may be the case, but I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. DEMPSEY. We will find out before the bill comes back again from the conferees.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUNBAR. As I understand it there is an unexpended balance of $5,000,000 available for the construction of locks and dams in the Ohio River.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. There was more than $9,000,000 available on the 1st of April for lock and dam construction work on the Ohio River.

Mr. DUNBAR. More than $9,000,000?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. More than $9,000,000.

Mr. DUNBAR. And during the coming fiscal year it will be impossible for the War Department, under the ordinary conditions which exist on that river, to spend more than that $9,000,000.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. If I were giving a guess, I should say there would be more than half of it left at the end of the nine months' period, March 4, 1921.

Mr. DUNBAR. So that under the reduced appropriation which will be effected by your bill the improvement of the Ohio River in the construction of locks and dams will be retarded in no way.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DUNBAR. And the work will be prosecuted to the fullest extent, so far as the engineers of the War Department find it possible to go ahead with the work.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I think that is correct.

Mr. OGDEN. Is that the opinion of Col. Taylor?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. That is my understanding. Last year they were tied up on account of high water. When the stage of the water is such that they can work, they lose no time.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Col. Taylor testified particularly as to this river work, and said it was limited only by the available plants, that they were using every plant that was in there and they could not induce contractors to move in with new plants because of the great expense of moving the plant, and because of the great volume of work offered the contractors throughout the Nation. In other words, every plant is busy to its full capacity and, as the chairman says, I do not believe you can expend half the money available for that project.

Mr. OGDEN. I will say to the gentleman that it is the purpose of Louisville to erect a pier, and it is dependent on these projects being completed and this work going forward. If the appropriation is not sufficient to permit the work to go forward it will discourage the municipal work that is contemplated.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. I do not think the gentleman need have any fear on that score.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to thoroughly understand the situation before this bill goes back to conference. The House provided a general appropriation of $12,000,000 for river and harbor work. The House passed a "porkless" river and harbor bill. The bill went to the Senate and the lump-sum appropriation of $12,000,000 was increased to $20,000,000. The House conferees were anxious to learn from the Senate conferees the reason for that increase. What was their surprise to find that not only was there no more reason for that increased appropriation than appeared when the bill was considered by the House, but that as time had passed during the interval conditions had been such that a much smaller amount of money had been contracted and spent than was anticipated.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. To make that definite, let me say that the estimated expense was $5,000,000 a month, and when we got the report for the period elapsed it turned out to be less than two and one-half millions a month. The Senate had the information that there would be thirteen millions on hand on the 1st day of July, and it turned out to be the fact that there will be $52,000,000 entirely aside from the appropriation in this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. In other words, the Senate added $8,000,000 to this bill by reason of misinformation. Eight million dollars, wholly unnecessary, added to the bill; $8,000,000 that could not be used. As a matter of fact, unless conditions shall change and a much larger sum be spent per month than has been recently or is likely to be spent in the future, there will be a considerable sum left at the end of the fiscal year, even with the $12,000,000 appropriation.

I realize that gentlemen who live in regions where there are river and harbor improvements are constantly importuned by boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and interested citizens to boost appropriations in the hope that by so doing their communities will secure a larger expenditure. And unfortunately such citizens at home are sometimes disposed to assert their opinions in the matter against that of the Representative who is much better informed. They thus place gentlemen in a somewhat embarrassing position at home.

Let me suggest to these gentlemen who are somewhat worried by these importunities from home that the attitude for them to take is this: That we are not only appropriating in the bill as it passed the House all the money that can be used, taken together with the sums available in the Treasury, but we are appropriating more than can be used economically or advantageously, more than will be used from present appearances, and that therefore in urging further appropriations they would not be helping their constituents or their cause. They would simply be urging the House to appropriate sums that are not necessary, to increase appropriations beyond what is needed, when the Treasury is already burdened with enormous appropriations, when our expenditures exceed our income.

No gentleman wants to be in that position, and gentlemen will be in a much better position at home, in my opinion, if they will tell their constituents what the situation is—a situation which is entirely satisfactory as it stands with the appropriation made by the House.

The House is not in favor of increasing this sum a dollar, and that ought to be understood. If there was any question about its not being understood, I should be inclined to insist on instructions, but I think it is a more satisfactory proceeding for the House to further insist on its disagreement. I believe that the Senate will yield, that it expects to yield, and that it knows that it ought to yield.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and agree to the conference asked for, and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 and agree to the conference asked for.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, Mr. DEMPSEY, and Mr. GALLAGHER.

GENERAL DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. GOOD, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, reported the bill (H. R. 14335) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARD reserved all points of order.

PERRY L. HAYNES.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 1309) for the relief of Perry L. Haynes, on the Speaker's table, with the Senate amendment thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut calls up the bill (H. R. 1309) for the relief of Perry L. Haynes, with a Senate amendment thereto, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the bill reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be again reported. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is this the case of the lieutenant who was held responsible for some money intrusted to a subordinate?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; and the Senate passed the bill and inserted the phrase "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS ROCK RIVER, ILL.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 4431) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Rock River in Lee County, State of Illinois, at or near the city of Dixon, in said county, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, a similar House bill having been reported favorably from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois calls up Senate bill 4431, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Illinois Central Railroad Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Rock River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the city of Dixon, in Lee County, Ill., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that this is a Senate bill?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And that a similar bill is on the House Calendar?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes; a similar House bill has been reported favorably from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. McKENZIE, a similar House bill, H. R. 14150, was ordered to lie on the table.

ASSOCIATION OF PRODUCERS OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize the Association of Producers of Agricultural Products for further consideration by the House under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota calls up for further consideration the bill H. R. 13931, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. In section 2 of the bill, on page 3, there is provision that the Secretary of Agriculture shall file in the district court in which such association has its principal place of business a certified copy of the order and of all the records in the proceeding, together with a petition asking that the order be enforced, and also that he shall give notice to the Attorney General and to said association of such filing. Who will be in charge of that litigation for the Government, the Attorney General or the attorney for the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The Department of Justice shall have charge of such order.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and I think the House is entitled to hear the explanation of it by the gentleman from Minnesota. For that reason I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MACGREGOR). On this vote 279 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for a moment? I desire to ask some questions. I can postpone them or ask them now, as the gentleman prefers.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman prefer to yield now or would the gentleman prefer to postpone the questions?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will use a little time to explain the bill first. Mr. Speaker, I ask that when five minutes are up I be notified. This bill seeks to give to the farmers the right to organize to sell the products of their own members. The first section is modeled upon the ordinary statute authorizing the creation of corporations. Instead of providing that any individual may become a member of a corporation upon conforming to certain regulations, this provides that the farmers may become members of certain associations, which are described and limited so as to make them actually cooperative associations for the purpose of aiding and assisting their respective members in the marketing of the crops that they produce.

Mr. PELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; my time will not permit it. In the Clayton Antitrust Act there is a provision authorizing associations of this kind, but they are limited so that they can not have capital stock or be organized for profit.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The present law—the Clayton antitrust law—relieves associations of agriculture not having capital stock. Why should we disturb that law; why should not this bill be confined altogether to prospective agricultural associations that are to have capital stock?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Well, personally, I would not have any objection to that, although, as we are granting these associations much larger powers than they had under the Clayton Antitrust Act, it was thought that they ought to be put under some supervision, because there has been complaint against some of these associations, and it was for that reason section 2 was drawn. That section is modeled largely upon some of the provisions of the Clayton Antitrust Act.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I suggest this to the gentleman, if I do not disturb him: To make section 2 apply to all associations, whether having or not having capital stock, would place a limitation and restriction which the Clayton law does not now contain upon the associations that have no capital stock.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is disputed. The contention is that these associations, if they are organized for the purpose of carrying on any business, so as to give a profit to their members, are subject to the Sherman law. That is one of the contentions that is being urged against these associations, and it is for that reason that they are asking for legislation of this kind. Now, a great many of these associations have been consulted in reference to this bill and so far as I know they are all favorable to it, and it seems to me that the situation demands that we pass something of this kind with or without the amendment suggested.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not yield any further. I want to say to you that in the various European countries farm associations are permitted to do the very thing we seek to authorize under this bill, and it seems to me that America ought not to lag behind in this respect. They are being authorized in a great many of the States in this country, but when they come in contact with interstate commerce they run up against threats that they are subject to prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act. It is necessary for them at least to have some capital on which to do business, and to make some profit that they can save for the purpose of taking care of losses that are always incident to any business, and it seems to me that we ought to give them this right. The provision in the bill that the profit must not exceed 8 per cent is intended to protect the farmers. It is designed to compel the officers of these associations to pay the proceeds from the products of the members to the members, to the farmers. Some of them insist that the dividend should not exceed 5 or 6 per cent instead of 8 per cent. These associations should make money for the members and not for the association. In these days of high money rates it was thought necessary to make the rate 8 per cent, otherwise it might not be possible to get the necessary money to do business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I fully realize in view of your past performances, it matters not what I or any other Member coming from a city may say about the unfairness of this bill, that it will be enacted, but, nevertheless, I can not refrain from calling your attention to the fact that I believe it is the most iniquitous piece of legislation that has ever been attempted to be passed by Congress.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman think the farmers are not entitled to make 8 per cent by holding goods if the present holders are making 200, 300, and 400 per cent in the cities of Chicago and New York?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Why limit it to 8 per cent?

Mr. SABATH. I fully agree with the gentleman from Illinois that the farmer is entitled to make 8 per cent, and I am willing that he should make 10 or even 20 per cent, but I am against his making 50 or 100 per cent. I am not any more against the farmer than I am against any other set of profiteers who are robbing the American public.

I am ready with you, sir [Mr. KING of Illinois], or you [Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi], to vote to-day or any day for any bill that will force and enable the Department of Justice to stop the profiteering that is going on on the part of various combinations and special corporate interests. I grant you that they are manipulators who have made and are to-day making unreasonably high profits, but two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that I am not overstating when I say that 99 per cent of the American people condemn the action of the Wall Street manipulators, trusts, and combinations who have, due to secret manipulations, increased the cost of all commodities and necessaries of life. I and many other Members have frequently pointed out the gouging on the part of these profiteers and the thievery they are perpetrating upon the consuming American public, and have urged criminal prosecution against them. We have bills and resolutions pending demanding the investigation and prosecution of the steel, lumber, cement, glass, paper, woolen, cotton, sugar, and many other combinations which you have refused to report, but instead of passing a bill that would put an end to this connivance and robbery you are going to vote for a bill that not only authorizes and legalizes but forces the formation of combinations, not for the purpose of lowering the present high cost of living or encouraging production, as has been stated by some of you Republican Members, but for the purpose of increasing prices and legalizing outrageous profiteering.

Mr. Speaker, President Wilson has repeatedly recommended and requested that you enact legislation strengthening the hands of the Department of Justice to enable it to prosecute the profiteers, but no action has been taken on your part to this day. Nevertheless every day some of you Republican gentlemen, for the purpose of home consumption, will rise and inquire what the Department of Justice is doing to bring down the high cost of living, but you have failed to give the Attorney General the legislation or the funds which would enable him doing so. It is the Republican Party and the interests you are serving that are responsible and you will not succeed in placing the blame on the President or the Democratic Party as you have planned.

The President has recommended the repeal of war measures, and has recommended the enactment of many reconstructive laws, but you have failed to act. The President recommended the repeal of war-time prohibition, but instead you have enacted the outrageous Volstead prohibition act. The President has pleaded for your cooperation in the adoption of the treaty of peace which was approved by every nation, including Germany and Austria, which would mean peace and happiness to the world, but for political expediency you have refused to ratify same.

Mr. Speaker, by this bill you invite the farmer, the planter, and fruit grower to plant a small crop and secure as large a price as he will choose to charge for any of his product, giving the right to the ranchman to set the prices for his stock and, through the authorization, enter into an agreement with the packers as to the price of hogs, cattle, sheep, and so forth, and they in turn will be at liberty to continue to exact as much for meat and meat products as the public will stand for. You are authorizing the vicious system on the part of the dairymen to sell their milk only to those distributors that will pledge themselves to charge outrageous prices agreed upon months in advance. In fact, if this bill is enacted into law, it will enable the farmers and planters of this country to have the full power to exact any price the combination or organization chooses to charge. I am fearful that the 75,000,000 American people who do not belong to the farmers or other millions will not stand this continuous, terrific increase in the cost of living and will not continue to tolerate this special class legislation, which is so unfair and iniquitous to them. They may sooner than you expect realize their strength and power and drive you from control, electing men who will not be swayed and controlled by special interests or who are blind and deaf to justice, righteousness, and fair play. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have been and am now against special legislation. I have been and am for equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Unfortunately for the people, that principle and policy are not known to the Republican majority now in control, as all they have done, outside of the consideration of the appropriation bills, is to legislate for the special interests. You have given the railroad barons $300,000,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury of the United States, and in addition you have also authorized them to increase the freight rates 33 per cent, which will mean an additional tax on the public of $1,000,000,000 a year, or $10 on every man, woman, and child in the United States. You have legislated for the contractors by making it possible for them to mulct the country of hundreds of millions of dollars. Only the other day you had another bill—which I am pleased I aided in defeating—wherein you endeavored to vote another $25,000,000 to the wooden-ship builders' combination. On Friday last you passed a bill exempting from taxation millions of dollars worth of Liberty bonds which have been bought up at 82 cents on the dollar by the Wall Street speculators and large banks. Instead of enacting a real bonus bill, as requested by the soldiers, you passed a bonus bill that will come to plague you, and, instead of imposing a tax on the war profiteers to raise the needed revenue, you again place a burden on the masses by imposing a tax on cigars, cigarettes, and tobaccos. You have failed to equalize and revise the war-revenue act.

You have up to this late hour failed to provide a living wage for the thousands of Government employees, who are forced to leave the service, thereby impairing the efficiency of every branch of our Government, and all under the false pretense of economy, following the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, but hoping that you will be able to go before the people with a cry of economy, when, in fact, for every dollar you have taken away from the departments you have given $10 to the railroads and contractors of this country.

You may be able to fool some, but you can not fool the majority of the people. They know that the Democratic Party is not responsible for the high cost of living, but that it is due to manipulation on the part of combinations, the money changers, and others, nearly all of whom are part and parcel of the Republican Party, and who, as the Senate investigation into the expenditures of the presidential candidates is disclosing, have already contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars to the different Republican candidates and who are ready to contribute millions more for the election. People know that these interests do not expend millions to help to elect a man who would be unfavorable to them, but, on the contrary, before they will let go of any of their ill-gotten fortunes they must have positive assurance that he will do their bidding and give them the protection they desire—and will have at any cost. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] wanted to ask for recognition.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the Joint Commission on the Postal Salaries, appointed under an act of Congress, is about ready to make a preliminary report accompanied by a bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that by the rules debate is limited to this bill.

Mr. MOON. I am not going to introduce it now. The Speaker does not understand me. If he will wait a moment, I will make myself plain.

The SPEAKER. Of course, this comes out of the time of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MOON. I am going to take just half a minute in which to make a request. We will be ready in a few hours to report, but we are afraid that Congress may adjourn to-day before we get the report in. It is a matter of importance, and I have been directed to make the report and introduce the bill, and I now ask unanimous consent that we may be permitted at any time up to 12 o'clock to-night to file the report and introduce the bill, and that for the information of the House the report be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may have until midnight to introduce the report of the Postal Commission, and that the report may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 1072, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.]

Mr. MOON, from the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries, submitted the following preliminary report:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Joint Commission on Postal Salaries authorized by section 3 of an act approved February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," respectfully submits this preliminary report, together with the draft of a bill, to the Congress.

The commission was directed "to investigate the salaries of postmasters and employees of the Postal Service with a view to the reclassification and readjustment of such salaries on an equitable basis."

The commission discovered at the outset that various laws contained in Post Office appropriation bills and in special acts of Congress and the regulations prescribed by the Post Office Department affecting the compensation of postmasters and postal employees had not been separately compiled since the publication of the Postal Laws and Regulations in 1913, except as contained in the annual Postal Guide and supplements thereto. Legislation with reference to salaries in the Postal Service has in recent years been amended in almost every particular modifying the method of compensation and the amount paid for practically all classes of postal employees with the exception of first and second class postmasters. Considerable time and labor was expended in the compilation of all such laws and regulations made pursuant thereto and brought to date for ready reference and use of the commission, including the current law, except the temporary increases provided in House joint resolution 151, effective November 6, 1919.

The commission conducted extended hearings in New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Paul, Cincinnati, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, Memphis, Kansas City, and St. Louis, at which points employees from the immediate and adjacent States submitted testimony and briefs respecting salaries and the necessity for equitable readjustment and reclassification. Members of the commission have also spent considerable time personally inspecting conditions and the nature and character of duties performed by the various groups of employees in the larger post offices, postal stations, in railway mail cars and terminals. The commission feels that thereby it has been enabled to arrive at more correct conclusions respecting a fair adjustment of salaries in the Postal Service.

For the purpose of the hearings employees were grouped as follows:

Carriers in the City Delivery Service.
Clerks at first and second class post offices.
Rural carriers.
Railway postal clerks.
Supervisory officials, including special clerks in first and second class post offices.
Watchmen, messengers, and laborers.
Printers, mechanics, and chauffeurs.
Village delivery carriers.
Special delivery messengers.

Post-office inspectors.
Supervisory officials in the Railway Mail Service.
First-class postmasters.
Second-class postmasters.
Third-class postmasters.
Fourth-class postmasters.

Separate hearings were conducted in Washington for first-class postmasters, officials in the post office inspection service, supervisory officials in the Railway Mail Service, and one or two other smaller groups.

The hearings were confined to employees actually in the service. The various groups mentioned above at each of the points selected their own spokesmen. Individual employees were permitted to and have filed a number of statesments in their own behalf. Considerable interest was manifested at the various hearings, which were well attended by postal men and an immense amount of information and data submitted amounting to 2,420 printed pages, which have been helpful and valuable to the commission in the extended study given to the subject.

Early in the investigation questionnaires were prepared and distributed to 14 groups of employees as follows:

1. Clerks in first and second class post offices.
2. Letter carriers in the City Delivery Service.
3. Supervisory employees, including special clerks, at first and second class post offices.
4. Printers, mechanics, watchmen, messengers, and laborers.
5. Rural delivery carriers.
6. Third-class postmasters.
7. Second-class postmasters.
8. First-class postmasters.
9. Terminal and transfer clerks, Railway Mail Service.
10. Railway postal clerks.
11. Village delivery carriers.
12. Post-office inspectors.
13. Clerks in offices of inspectors in charge.
14. Fourth-class postmasters.

The questionnaires called for specific data and information not otherwise obtainable. More than 125,000 questionnaires were returned, which have been carefully analyzed and tabulated. A study of the analyses of the questionnaires discloses valuable and interesting information, worthy of preservation for reference in connection with future legislation affecting the Postal Service. This information will be presented in a subsequent report.

The commission has heard 537 witnesses and in addition a large number of written statements and briefs appear in the printed copies of the hearings. For the first time in the history of the Postal Service its employees and officials have been permitted to present personally their own views and reasons for needed legislation affecting the service.

In a further effort to have the benefit of suggestions from practical experienced men, about 25 postal experts were selected from various groups of postal employees, including clerks at first and second class post offices, carriers in the City Delivery Service, supervisory officials in first and second class post offices, railway postal and terminal clerks, rural delivery carriers, first-class postmasters, second-class postmasters, third-class postmasters, fourth-class postmasters, post-office inspectors, and supervisory officials of the Railway Mail Service.

They were directed to report in Washington on March 29, 1920. They had previously been provided with copies of the testimony presented to the commission, and were directed to submit for the consideration of the commission a tentative schedule of salary adjustments, with proper regard for the relative importance of each group to other groups and to the entire service, together with suggestions for a proper salary scale for each of the various groups of postal employees. This committee was in continuous session, at work night and day, for 10 days, and, with two or three exceptions, submitted a unanimous report, which has been helpful and valuable in arriving at just and proper conclusions respecting adequate and equitable salary adjustments in the Postal Service. This report was thereupon submitted to representatives of some of the groups of postal men who desired to be heard and to officials of the Post Office Department. The latter were invited, and have submitted, along with oral statements, written recommendations and suggestions, both with reference to the conclusions of the committee of postal experts and to the general subject of the investigation.

Hearings were concluded on April 23, 1920, since which date the commission has been in session almost daily in consideration and in the preparation of a salary scale and adjustments of salaries in the Postal Service.

The magnitude of the investigation will be appreciated when it is remembered that the service is composed of approximately 300,000 employees, of which 39,148 clerks at first and second class post offices, 36,105 carriers in the City Delivery Service, 19,202 clerks in the Railway Mail Service, 666 first, 2,538 second, 7,849 third, and 41,645 fourth class postmasters, 42,210 rural delivery carriers, and approximately 5,000 supervisory employees, including foremen and special clerks.

After very careful and painstaking consideration of the numerous questions invloved in an investigation affecting such a large number of persons employed in every town, city, and community in the United States and in Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska, the commission presents this preliminary report and recommends what it believes to be just, equitable, and liberal provisions in the matter of compensation for postmasters and employees in the Postal Service.

The commission regrets that lack of time prevents the preparation of a comprehensive report with detailed information showing the history, growth, development, and salaries fixed from time to time with respect to the various groups of employes in the Postal Service. In a subsequent final report such information with regard to each branch of the Postal Service will be submitted.

The commission is unanimous in the recommendation to the Congress that legislation should be speedily enacted to the end that the compensation of postal men may be placed on an equitable basis, and if legislation is not enacted prior to the next fiscal year that when enacted it shall be effective as of July 1, 1920.

A number of employees are paid from lump-sum appropriations for whom no specific wage has heretofore been fixed and likewise is not fixed in the recommendations of the commission. When the law shall become effective the commission anticipates that the department will readjust the salaries of such employees to accord with the compensation recommended herein for those with similar and comparable duties and responsibilities.

The additional increases for the succeeding three years will average approximately $3,700,000 per year.

The work of the joint commission was delayed for a period by the late illness and death of its able and distinguished chairman, Hon. John H. Bankhead, Senator from Alabama, the long-time chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and whose great interest in the welfare of the employees in the Postal Service and in the needed readjustment of their salaries never faltered.

Respectfully submitted.

STATEMENT OF THE RECOMMENDATIONS CONTAINED IN THE PRELIMINARY REPORT OF THE JOINT COMMISSION ON POSTAL SALARIES.

Clerks at first and second class post offices and carriers in City Delivery Service, five grades: Grade 1, $1,400; grade 2, $1,500; grade 3, $1,600; grade 4, $1,700; grade 5, $1,800.

Substitutes, temporaries, and auxiliaries, 60 cents per hour.

Credit for actual time served as substitute in advancement in grades when appointed regular clerk or carrier.

Special clerks, two grades, $1,900 and $2,000.

Printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers to be paid and promoted as clerks.

Watchmen, messengers, and laborers, two grades, $1,350 and $1,450.

Motor Vehicle Service to continue under lump-sum appropriation.

Railway Mail Service, six grades, as follows: Grade 1, $1,600; grade 2, $1,700; grade 3, $1,850; grade 4, $2,000; grade 5, $2,150; grade 6, $2,300.

Clerks to be in classes A and B: Railway post offices now in class A, terminal and transfer offices to be in class A; others in class B. Laborers in two grades, $1,350 and $1,450.

Progression for road clerks to grade 3 and to grade 4 for clerks in charge for class A, and to grade 5 for clerks and to grade 6 for clerks in charge in class B. Progression for terminal and transfer clerks to grade 3 when general scheme distribution not required and to grade 4 when general scheme distribution is required. Clerks in charge to grade 5 in terminals or tours or crews consisting of not more than 19 clerks or in transfer offices or tours in transfer offices of not more than 4 clerks, and to grade 6 in terminals or tours or crews in terminals of 20 or more clerks and in transfer offices or tours in transfer offices or 5 or more clerks.

Clerk in charge is defined as the clerk in charge of railway post offices, terminal or transfer offices, whether alone or in charge of a crew.

In division superintendents' offices all clerks progress to grade 3, four to grade 4, four to grade 5, four to grade 6, and in offices of chief clerks all clerks to grade 3, and one each to grades 4, 5, and 6. Progression for examiners to grade 5 and assistant examiners to grade 4. Substitutes to be paid as grade 1 clerks for actual service performed for one year and appointed unassigned clerk of grade 2 unless sooner appointed regular clerk.

Service of all clerks to be of an average of eight hours per day, 306 days per annum, including allowance for service during lay-off periods. Cash or compensatory time to be allowed for service in excess of eight hours.

Substitute and unassigned clerks to be credited with full time to and from official headquarters to an assignment, with travel allowance while on duty and also travel allowances while on duty on a line starting from official headquarters.

Division superintendents to be $4,200; assistant division superintendents, $3,200; two assistants, at $3,100 each; and one in charge of car construction, $3,000. Chief clerks, $3,000; and assistant chief clerks, $2,500; the heads of sections in such offices to be rated as assistant chief clerks.

Post-office inspectors to be divided into seven grades with progression to grade 5 and after one year's meritorious service to grade 6, and 20 per cent to grade 7 for specially meritorious service after one year's service in grade 6, as follows: Grade 1, $2,300; grade 2, $2,500; grade 3, $2,700; grade 4, $2,900; grade 5, $3,200; grade 6, $3,500; grade 7, $3,700; inspector in charge, $4,200.

Actual expenses not to exceed $5 per day when absent from home domiciles and official headquarters.

Clerks at division headquarters post-office inspection service divided into six grades, with progression to grade 5 and one to grade 6, as follows: Grade 1, $1,600; grade 2, $1,700; grade 3, $1,850; grade 4, $2,000; grade 5, $2,150; grade 6, $2,300; chief clerk, $2,600.

Substitutes are provided at offices of division headquarters post-office inspection service.

Rural delivery carriers, $1,800 for 24 miles and $30 for each mile in excess of 24 miles. Deductions for partial failure to perform service shall not exceed rate of pay per mile per day for 24 miles or less and likewise in excess of 24 miles.

Motor route carriers, 50 miles and over, not in excess of $2,600 per annum.

Village delivery carriers, from $1,000 to $1,200, under regulations to be prescribed by the department.

Fourth-class postmasters, 140 per cent on cancellations of $75 per quarter and less; 115 per cent from $75 to $100 of cancellations per quarter; and in excess of $100 per quarter, 100 per cent on first $100, 75 per cent on next $100 or less, and 60 per cent on the remainder. When compensation amounts to $1,000 and gross postal receipts amount to $1,500 within one year, fourth-class offices shall be advanced to third class.

Third-class postmasters are increased $300 from basic salaries each, the salaries ranging from $1,000 to $2,200. Clerk hire to be same as under present law, readjusted annually.

Second-class postmasters are increased from $100 to $300 each, the salary ranging from $2,300 to $3,000, and the grades according to gross receipts from $8,000 to $40,000, reduced from 10 to 8. Assistant postmasters to be in eight grades from $1,800, with increases of $50 in each grade to $2,150.

First-class postmasters to be in 14 grades, with modified schedules in each grade according to gross receipts from $40,000 to more than $7,000,000. Increases range from $200 to $300 and $400 where the salary is now $3,600 and $3,700, to $400 and $500 where the salary is now $3,700 and $3,800, and $500 and $600 where the salary is now $3,900 and $4,000. No increase is provided where the salary is now $5,000 and over.

SUPERVISORY OFFICERS IN OFFICES OF THE FIRST CLASS.

The two-division plan is approved for all post offices except those where the receipts are in excess of $20,000,000 per annum.

At offices of the first class, the annual salaries of employees, other than those of the clerical grades, shall be graded in even hundreds of dollars, based upon the postal receipts for the preceding calendar year at the post office in which they are employed, as follows:

In addition to the number of regular employees assigned to a delivery station each $100,000 receipts to be considered one employee, and at finance stations $25,000 to be considered one employee. At stations less than four employees and less than $100,000 receipts the salary to be not more than a special clerk.

Not more than one assistant superintendent of mails, of delivery, of registry, and cashier shall receive the maximum salary provided, except where the receipts are $9,000,000 and less than $20,000,000, where two assistant superintendents of mails shall be appointed at the maximum, one to be in charge of delivery.

In offices designated State depositories and central accounting where the receipts are less than $500,000 the employee directly in charge of the work to be paid $200 additional, and $200 additional for the cashier in such offices where a postal cashier is provided.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Fifteen days' annual leave for all employees, with pay, and sick leave 10 days each year, to be cumulative for three years, but no sick leave granted with pay for more than 30 days in any one year.

Restoration to grade after reduction in salary shall not be construed as promotion within the law prohibiting advancement of more than one grade in one year.

Payment in money for holiday and Sunday service is denied, and compensatory time for such service must be taken within six days next succeeding Sunday service and 30 days succeeding holiday service.

Promotions in salary after July 1, 1921, to be not more than $300 per annum, except when appointed postmaster, inspector in charge, or superintendent in Railway Mail Service.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that will not be taken out of my time. I think it is of sufficient importance outside of that. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, a good deal has been said about the existence of European statutes which permit the doing in European countries of the things which are sought to be done under the provisions of this bill. I have not any desire or any right to question the statement of the gentlemen who have said that exactly the same thing can be done in European countries which they are seeking to accomplish under the provisions of this bill. But those statutes are not before us, and I doubt very much if there is any legislation which allows the doing of this thing in the way in which it is proposed to be done here. And if there is any such legislation, then I believe it is very bad legislation, and we should not adopt it in this country.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. I have only a few minutes. I would rather yield later.

Mr. KING. When you get through.

Mr. HUSTED. This bill is the substitute for the Capper-Hersman bill, upon which we had a number of hearings in the Committee on the Judiciary. I attended those hearings and listened very attentively to the statements of the representatives of the various farmer organizations that appeared there. I became convinced, as the result of those hearings, that the object sought to be accomplished by this bill was not the reduction of the cost of distributing the products, because they admitted that they did not intend to do away with the middleman, but the object was to enable farmers to organize in order to get better prices. That was what they wanted, and that was what they were quite frank in asserting they wanted. They said that the farmers were at a disadvantage in dealing with the men who bought their products, and that this legislation should be enacted in order to enable them to be on better terms in dealing with the large corporations that bought food products. Now, the object of this bill is to enable farmers to associate themselves together and have a common selling agency. There is absolutely no limitation upon any price they may charge, unless the Secretary of Agriculture sees fit to hold that they have unduly enhanced the price of some product, either by restricting competition or by restraining trade.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to ask the gentleman one question there. Is that remedy in the Secretary of Agriculture exclusively, in your judgment?

Mr. HUSTED. That remedy is in the Secretary of Agriculture exclusively. If he does not move, absolutely nobody can move, and the bill does not give the individual, it does not give any association, any right to go into court and have these prices reviewed.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Certainly.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Is it not a fact that these men may be prosecuted for combining or conspiring with any corporation to increase prices?

Mr. HUSTED. Oh, they can organize just as big an association as they want, and the bill expressly provides that they may fix prices, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. And that includes not only the Sherman Antitrust Act, but the Clayton Act and every other act that in any way, shape, or manner attempts to control prices.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I ask the gentleman if that same argument can not also be made against every corporation?

Mr. HUSTED. No; not that same argument. I am not altogether in love with the Sherman Antitrust Act. I believe that the Sherman Antitrust Act favors big aggregations of capital at the expense of the little man. I do not believe in any statute which puts a shackle upon production. The recent war proved that in order to secure production we had practically to make a dead letter of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and if there is anything that we need in this country to-day to bring back normal prices it is increased production. But I do not believe in class legislation, and I do not believe in taking one class of our citizens entirely out of the operations of the antitrust act and keeping other classes in, and then putting in one man, and one man alone, the power to control the prices of the necessities of life.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield now for a moment?

Mr. HUSTED. I will.

Mr. KING. Did not the gentleman vote for the bill incorporating the Edge corporations, which repealed a part of the Sherman Antitrust Act and gave them the right to operate?

Mr. HUSTED. I was opposed to the Edge bill, and I spoke against it on the floor of the House.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the gentleman another question. This amounts to forestalling the market, does it not?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not know exactly what the gentleman means.

Mr. KING. The difference between the farmers being allowed to get 8 per cent and men getting 200 per cent by hoarding wool and food in the city of New York.

Mr. HUSTED. What the gentleman says shows that he has not the remotest idea of what this bill does, because he talks about the farmers getting 8 per cent. The 8 per cent provision is for the protection of the farmers in getting higher prices, and is not in the interest of the public in any degree whatever.

Mr. KING. Let the gentleman attack the New York profiteers in foodstuffs and clothing instead of the farmers.

Mr. HUSTED. All of the farmers have not money enough to furnish the capital stock of these associations in equal amounts. There are some rich farmers that can buy $10,000 worth of stock, while another farmer may be able to buy $1,000 worth, and perhaps another who is only capable of buying $500 worth of the stock.

The bill provides that the association itself, as an association, shall not declare more than 8 per cent of dividends on its stock, and the object of that is to prevent the big farmer, who is able to put $5,000, or $10,000, or $15,000 into the capital stock of one of these associations, from running away with the profits at the expense of the other farmers. But the power of price control of products is vested in the association by its ability to get the farmers together and agree that all the farmers that belong to this association shall not sell their potatoes, or their wheat, or any other agricultural product that the association deals in, at less than the price agreed upon in the association, and the power to sell those products for the common benefit of all is vested in this selling agency; and there is not any limit—any reasonable limit—to the price they could charge unless the Secretary of Agriculture should see fit to declare that they were charging an excessive price.

Now, what are the provisions in relation to that? In the first place, the Secretary of Agriculture has got to give the offending association at least 30 days' notice before he can take any action. Then, after he has taken action, the offending association can still operate for 30 days more and absolutely nothing can be done to it, and then the Secretary of Agriculture goes into court to get an order, an injunction, and that may take 30 days more. So that it is entirely possible that the association would have 90 days, a period of time amply long enough to market a crop, before a single thing could be done to it, and it is absolutely certain that it would have at least 60 days during which absolutely nothing could be done to it to stop it from selling its products at grossly excessive prices.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am very free to confess that I do not like legislation of this character. I have suggested a number of times to the House what I believe ought to be the legislation enacted to meet the existing agricultural situation. But I do not believe that this legislation is as dangerous as doing nothing.

Let us see what the situation is, and I suggest to my friends who live in the big cities that they ought to get out of their minds just as quickly as possible the idea that the economic problems of agriculture are of concern only to the man who farms. Out in the country live the agricultural producers; in the cities are the industrial producers. Each of these activities is bidding for the energy of every man and for the capital, every dollar of it, in the United States. The man who is running a manufacturing business is doing business, as compared with agriculture, upon a cost-plus basis. He charges into the price of his commodities the labor cost, whatever the price he must pay for labor, and every other item of cost in production. Do not forget that. Agriculture sells its product to the highest bidder in a restricted market. It sells in this sort of market at the price fixed by purchasers. You can readily appreciate the disadvantages of agriculture bidding against industry for any man's labor. The census reports show that, notwithstanding the fact that we have passed the danger line, we are now in the midst of the greatest residential and vocational migration sweeping in from the country upon the cities that has ever been known in the history of the ages.

Now, that means that right behind the problem of the high cost of living, gentlemen, widespread hunger is coming, and no man who has any sense can close his eyes to that. You can not maintain the balance in population as between the country and the city when you have one side tilted up by an economic advantage any more than you can control the level of water in a basin poised on a pivot unless there be equality of weight in the parts of the basin. And let us not forget that population is more fluid in this country to-day than it has ever been in the history of the world.

I repeat, this is not the right way to remedy the situation. But it is not so dangerous as doing nothing. What does this bill propose? It proposes to give the farmer the privilege of organizing and to give, under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, the privilege of operating cooperatively for a profit to the joint venture of not more than 8 per cent, and thereby give to farmers a chance to make more profit than they make now. What is that? It means that we propose to help equip agriculture with the ability to bid sufficiently high for the necessary share of the productive energy of this country to enable it to raise enough food and clothing material to feed and clothe your bodies in the cities. That is all there is in it, and that is the only way it can be done.

It is foolishness to ask the country boy to go back to the farm unless the farm can bid as much for him as the factory bids. You might as well go down and appeal to the waters of the Potomac River to flow uphill, and expect them to do it because you tell them how beautiful the hills of Virginia are. It is all foolishness, and if you folks who live in big cities do not get this notion out of your heads, and if you do not help to make it possible for the American farmer to make enough money to hold his boys in the country against some automobile factory that is bidding to take them into the city, you will see, and that soon, crowds of hunger-crazed people surging through the streets of the big cities crying for bread, and anybody who has good sense ought to know it. I used to think that every big man in the city was a big man everywhere, but some of them are like the cucumbers which we boys used to put in glass bottles when they were little. They would grow and fill the bottle, but there was no cucumber on the outside. They would just stay there and turn yellow and rot. [Laughter.]

I am not trying to appeal to prejudice. I am trying to appeal to your good sense and to your instincts of self-preservation. I represent a city which largely dominates my congressional district. I represent also a part of the great agricultural section of my State. This proposed legislation is regarded as a farmers' bill. It does deal with an economic problem of agriculture, but it is incomparably of more importance to those of my constituents who live in the cities than it is to those who live in the country. It is more important to those who must have these products to live than it is to those who sell them to get money.

I am not speaking extravagantly when I say that hunger is approaching the cities of America, and even now is nigh unto their gates.

There must be given to agriculture some compensatory advantage to offset the present economic advantage which industry holds by reason of the fact that it can write into the selling price which it fixes all cost of production plus a profit.

I do not like to vote for this sort of legislation any better than you gentlemen who are opposing it. But since you will not enact the measures which I have proposed, we are driven to this alternative. We are close to the gravest sort of food crisis in this country. This bill may provide some protection and help to hold against a worse situation until we can put into operation a real constructive policy which will be free from the criticism of direct class advantage. As a matter of fact, however, under the circumstances, this is legislation directed against a common danger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE].

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed with the statement made by the gentleman from Texas. It seems to me it is just a question whether this Government is going to have a well-defined policy toward the farmers or not.

Mr. Speaker, the farmers of this country are to this Nation what the foundation is to the house. The life, the health, and contentment of the American people rest upon the broad shoulders of the American farmers, who feed them and, to a great extent, clothe them. Yet this great class of people which is the bone and sinew of our land has practically nothing to do with the prices of its crops, cattle, and so forth. The manufacturer buys raw material at the manufacturer's price and sells it for the manufacturer's price. The merchant sells at his own price. But the farmer toils all the year producing his crops and raising his live stock and has to sell not at his price but for the price the miller, the manufacturer, or the packer offers him. That is not fair. The farmers should have the same right to set the price upon what they produce as the merchants, the manufacturers, or the packers, as long as they are fair and reasonable. Under our present high prices some might think that the farmers are in on the profit game; but in proportion to the money invested, the increase in cost of production, and what they have to pay the merchants for what they consume, the profits of the farmers are not large. The question then arises, Why are the prices too high to the ultimate consumer? Simply because of the unnecessary middleman. I have heard it stated on the floor of this House that out of every $3 paid by the consumer the middleman gets $2 and the farmer or producer gets only $1. That system of distribution, although very old, is very objectionable and should be and can be remedied. It is unfair to the consumer, because he has to pay too much for what he needs, and it is unfair to the farmer, because he receives too little in return for his investment of time and labor expended. Mr. Hoover says:

> The whole marketing system in many of our commodities is indirect, expensive, wasteful, obsolete, and increases the margin unduly. Our manufacturing industries have developed out of pace with our agriculture, and labor is being drawn in thousands from the farm to the town at wages with which the farmer can not contend.

The problem, then, seems to be to, as nearly as possible, eliminate this intermediate speculator between the producer and the consumer, and then the producer and consumer can share the $2 that is now being levied by the middle party. The question is, How can this be done? By bringing the producer and consumer together. And then, How can that be done? It certainly can not be done as long as there is no unity of action on the part of the farmers. The farmers must lawfully organize and cooperate if they expect to have anything to say about the prices of their products and bridging the gap between themselves and the consumers. If they can do this, they can both standardize and increase their output and also stabilize their income. The consumer should also be interested in this proposition, because it would mean that the money that in the past has been absorbed in a manner that decreased production would under this plan be applied in a way that would rather stimulate production, which ultimately means lower prices to the consumers. But there are some legal barriers at present which prevent the farmers from being able to fully organize effectively, and it is for the purpose of removing these barriers that the various collective bargaining bills have been introduced, and this bill, H. R. 13931, has been reported by the committee favorably.

Let us now examine the legal status of the situation and see why legislation along these lines is necessary.

An act of Congress of October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act, in section 6 provides:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, "and not having capital stock or conducted for" profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof. Nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

This policy of Congress was again expressed in the deficiency appropriation bill of October 21, 1919, in the following language:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of farmers, producers, and associations of farmers who cooperate and work in an effort to and for the purpose of obtaining and maintaining a fair and reasonable price for their products.

The apparent intention of Congress, however, is not clearly expressed in section 6 of the Clayton Act, and it is rather uncertain what these farm organizations can lawfully do or what are "the legitimate objects thereof." Section 6 of the Clayton Act also exempts only those farm associations "not having capital stock or conducted for profit." The practical operation of that clause is that in States where there is no law permitting the organization of associations without "capital stock" and "not conducted for profit" it is impossible for the farmers to organize because if they organize with capital stock they do not come within section 6 of the Clayton Act, and if they attempt to organize without "capital stock and not conducted for profit," they violate the State laws of these certain States.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWOPE. Not now. I have not the time.

Now, several States have enacted laws making collective sales lawful, but inasmuch as there are many of the producers' organizations whose business extends into several States, they therefore come within the Federal laws, and it is therefore proper that Congress should declare a plain, unmistakable, and fair policy with reference to them.

The Committee on the Judiciary with that purpose in view has very wisely reported out the bill H. R. 13931, which authorizes the association of producers of agricultural products. This bill, in my opinion, will be of far-reaching effect and will be of great help to both producers and consumers. The bill is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Be it enacted, etc., That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce, such products of their members; and such producers may organize and operate such associations and make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect that purpose, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

First. That no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; or,

Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached, or contained therein, a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place not less than 30 days after the service thereof, requiring the association to show cause why an order should not be made directing it to cease and desist from so restraining trade or lessening competition in such article. An association so complained of may at the time and place so fixed show cause why such order should not be entered. The evidence given on such a hearing shall be reduced to writing and made a part of the record therein. If upon such hearing the Secretary of Agriculture shall be of the opinion that such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is, or is about to become, unduly enhanced thereby, he shall issue and cause to be served upon the association an order reciting the facts found by him, directing such association to cease and desist therefrom. If such association fails or neglects for 30 days to obey such order, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file in the district court in which such association has its principal place of business a certified copy of the order and of all the records in the proceeding, together with a petition asking that the order be enforced, and shall give notice to the Attorney General and to said association of such filing. Such district court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify said order, and may make rules as to pleadings and proceedings to be had in considering such order.

The facts found by the Secretary of Agriculture and recited as set forth in said order shall be prima facie evidence of such facts, but either party may adduce additional evidence. The Department of Justice shall have charge of the enforcement of such order. After the order is so filed in such district court, and while pending for review, the district court may issue a temporary writ of injunction forbidding such association from violating such order or any part thereof. The court may upon conclusion of its hearing enforce such order by a permanent injunction or other appropriate remedy. Service of such complaint and of all notices may be made upon such association by service upon any officer or agent thereof engaged in carrying on its business, and such service shall be binding upon such association, the officers, and members thereof.

In section 1 the bill permits persons engaged in agricultural products, as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers, to act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, to collectively prepare and place their products upon the market. It also provides that no member shall have more than one vote regardless of the stock he may own therein. Provision is also made that the association shall not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum. Section 2 of the bill is to protect the consumer and outlines the remedy in case these organizations should restrain trade or lessen competition. My personal opinion is that the farmers will never abuse the privileges extended to them under this bill; nevertheless I think the committee has acted wisely by staying on the safe side and providing a remedy in case the privilege should be abused.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this bill will not only tend to dignify farm life but will stimulate interest in agricultural pursuits and help stop the influx of the rural population into the cities, and thereby increase production. [Applause.]

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request—to extend my remarks on this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, are these remarks all to be confined to the bill?

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, there is no probability, is there, that any of these remarks will be about the bonus bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the request to be on this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I make the same request.

Mr. FIELDS. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is better to take them individually. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I make the same request.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that all Members have three legislative days in which to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. KINKAID. Make it five days.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; let them work a little.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Wyoming I withdraw it.

By unanimous consent, the following Members were granted leave to extend their remarks on this bill: Mr. PELL, Mr. FIELDS, Mr. SABATH, Mr. WELLING, Mr. UPSHAW, Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. WHITE of Kansas, Mr. LAYTON, Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, Mr. RUBEY, Mr. MICHENER, Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON, Mr. FLOOD, Mr. OLIVER, and Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to know if all of these gentlemen who are making requests to extend remarks on this bill are farmers?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer the gentleman's question. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the passage of the pending bill. It reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13931) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products.

Be it enacted, etc., That persons engaged in the production of agricultural products as farmers, planters, ranchmen, dairymen, or fruit growers may act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce, such products of their members; and such producers may organize and operate such associations and make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect that purpose, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof, as such producers, and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

First. That no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; or,

Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 per cent per annum.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached, or contained therein, a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place not less than 30 days after the service thereof, requiring the association to show cause why an order should not be made directing it to cease and desist from so restraining trade or lessening competition in such article. An association so complained of may at the time and place so fixed show cause why such order should not be entered. The evidence given on such a hearing shall be reduced to writing and made a part of the record therein. If upon such hearing the Secretary of Agriculture shall be of the opinion that such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is, or is about to become, unduly enhanced thereby, he shall issue and cause to be served upon the association an order reciting the facts found by him, directing such association to cease and desist therefrom. If such association fails or neglects for 30 days to obey such order, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file in the district court in which such association has its principal place of business a certified copy of the order and of all the records in the proceeding, together with a petition asking that the order be enforced, and shall give notice to the Attorney General and to said association of such filing. Such district court shall thereupon have jurisdiction to affirm, set aside, or modify said order, and may make rules as to pleadings and proceedings to be had in considering such order.

The facts found by the Secretary of Agriculture and recited as set forth in said order shall be prima facie evidence of such facts, but either party may adduce additional evidence. The Department of Justice shall have charge of the enforcement of such order. After the order is so filed in such district court, and while pending for review, the district court may issue a temporary writ of injunction forbidding such association from violating such order or any part thereof. The court may upon conclusion of its hearing enforce such order by a permanent injunction or other appropriate remedy. Service of such complaint and of all notices may be made upon such association by service upon any officer or agent thereof engaged in carrying on its business, and such service shall be binding upon such association, the officers, and members thereof: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to the organizations or individual members thereof described in section 6 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.

If enacted into law, it would relieve farm organizations from certain embarrassments that may arise at any time under existing laws. While removing such embarrassments it safeguards in the proper manner the rights of the public. While no special prosecutions may have arisen under the existing laws, the probability of legal prosecution prevents farmers from cooperation with one another in the handling and marketing of farm products.

The provisions of the bill are clearly disclosed in the report of the committee, which shows that the dangers mentioned by some in this debate are wholly imaginary. This debate, however, has disclosed the strongest possible argument for the passage of the bill. The arguments advanced in opposition to the bill convince me more strongly than ever that this legislation is necessary in the interests of the farmers.

The statements of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the unwarranted precipitation of an enforced adjournment of the House last Friday evening revealed the existence and nature of the opposition to this bill. It is a challenge from the manufacturing centers against the agricultural sections of the country. It asserts an assumed right on the part of the industrial centers to dictate to the agricultural interests of the country with respect to the methods which they should employ in the management of their own business affairs. That opposition assumes the inherent right of the industrial and manufacturing centers of the country to organize among themselves for the benefit of their own affairs and at the same time deny that privilege to the producers of food throughout the country.

As a Representative of an agricultural district and State I gladly accept the challenge of the gentleman from Massachusetts and will promptly join with all the Representatives of the agricultural sections of this Nation to resist in every reasonable way the principles embodied in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He seems to assume that the cooperation made possible and safe under the terms of this bill are calculated to increase the cost of food supplies. I deny his assumption in this matter. Intelligent cooperation among the farmers of the country under the terms of this bill will increase the production of food products to such an extent as to secure reasonable prices in the markets. If the gentleman from Massachusetts means that the farmers must sell the products of their labor to the people of the industrial centers at the lowest possible prices, even at a loss to the producers, while the manufacturing centers are allowed to sell their products to the farmers at the highest possible prices, I deny his right to enforce a policy of that kind even through an unwarranted adjournment of this House at any time.

The action of last Friday evening has clearly revealed to many men in this House the latent purpose to force an "irrepressible conflict" between the industrial centers on the one hand and the agricultural centers on the other. How can Representatives discharge the full measure of their official duties to their constituents and to their country unless they stand together as one man and demand for the agricultural interests of the country equal opportunities and benefits in the open markets of the Nation? This "irrepressible conflict" is revealed by the facts that the industrial centers on the one hand are directly interested in securing the highest possible prices for their labor and paying the lowest possible prices for food products, while on the other hand the agricultural sections are interested in securing the highest possible prices for the products of their labor and paying the lowest possible prices for manufactured articles that they are compelled to use.

Then, how are we as a Nation to find a common ground on which we can all stand and share equally in the distribution of privileges and benefits? This desired and necessary result can not be secured by denying to the farmers of the country the privileges embodied in this bill. The attempted denial of those benefits was clearly foreshadowed in the unwarranted adjournment of this House last Friday evening.

Mr. Speaker, all the benefits proposed by this bill for the farmers of the country have been granted heretofore to the financial, manufacturing, and labor centers of the Nation. Then why deny these privileges to the farmers of the Nation? That denial is unwarranted and unjust. The enforcement of that denial will hasten the "irrepressible conflict" and compel the Representatives from the agricultural districts and States to oppose to the full limit like demands from the manufacturing and industrial centers.

In order that we may ward off the evil day of that "irrepressible conflict," I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his speech for repairs and join with us in the passage of this bill, and thus give legislative proof that we are ready to deal fairly and justly with the farmers of the Nation.

The agricultural communities have the same right to organize and manage their business affairs as the industrial and manufacturing communities have to organize and manage theirs. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the river and harbor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the river and harbor bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN].

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Speaker, the report of the committee on this bill is very clear, persuasive, and conclusive. I would like to have time to show where the agricultural farmers' organizations that have been organized in this country have been of great benefit to the city people, to the consumers of this Nation. I would like to have time to show how they have standardized their products, greatly to the benefit of the consumer, and how, by judicious advertising, they have drawn attention to their fruits and other farm products. I would like to have time to show what the farmers have been able to get under the cooperative associations and to submit in detail figures that show they have not raised the prices to the consumer.

I picked up in my office before I left a copy of the report of the California Almond Growers' Exchange. That triangle that you see here [indicating] represents what the farmer got before he was organized. It is one-quarter of the price that the consumer paid. The farmer got 25 cents out of the consumer's dollar. The first year after the organization he got what is represented by the second black figure, almost half of the consumer's dollar. To-day he is getting close to three-quarters of the consumer's dollar. They have cut down the tax in transit, and the consumer was not paying any more for almonds last year than he was nine years ago.

Mr. KING. The gentleman means the ultimate consumer?

Mr. HERSMAN. Yes. Now, I would like to discuss what the prune and apricot growers and the raisin growers have done for themselves. Their organizations have raised the price to the farmers and taken away the profits of the middleman, and not until last year was the price increased to the consumer. Under the stimulating influence of increased price, planting has greatly increased. The acreage in some fruits has increased 200 per cent. What does that mean? It means that the product will be greatly increased and ultimately the farmers can afford to sell them for less when the market is stabilized and a price can be reasonably assured by his association. My time is too short to consider these points at length, but I mention them in order to show to the opponents of this bill that cooperative farm associations tend to increase production.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSMAN. I can not; I have but little time.

The greatness of any nation depends upon maintaining a contented and prosperous rural population. Its very life can be measured by the condition of those who till the soil. It is therefore of the greatest importance that any legislation touching the life of the farmer should be most carefully considered, and his interests must necessarily be jealously guarded. To-day the farmer finds his success in business must be governed by the same methods used by others. The economic conditions that have changed the individual to the partnership and finally to the corporate method of doing business can not be disregarded by the farmer any more than they can be disregarded by others engaged in other lines of business. Operating individually, he is helpless and falls an easy victim to the organized operators who deal in his output. The products of the farms of this Nation have been in the hands of the speculator and gambler from the very foundation of the Republic. It has been a most difficult and a very slow and expensive experience for the farmer to realize that in order to succeed he must cooperate with other farmers to achieve success in his business ventures. The very nature of his business and his mode of life has inclined him to act alone and independently, and it is only through dire necessity that he has finally realized that in order to follow his chosen occupation to provide for his family and to safeguard old age that he must adopt modern methods and cooperate with others in the marketing and distribution of his products.

The Congress of the United States when it passed the Clayton Act, realizing this important principle and the changing business methods, specifically legalized the kind of cooperative farm associations that were then in operation in the following language:

> The labor of the human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit.

The language is not clear, and the farm organizations of to-day have been subjected to much annoyance and uncertainty because of this fact. The farmer of to-day finds that his associations must have capital stock in order to handle his business most effectively, and this bill is intended to legalize farmers' cooperative associations having capital stock. He is not asking for specific exemption; he is not asking to be considered a privileged class; he knows that in order to compete with others in business he should have capital stock, and he is simply asking this Congress to legalize his organizations that are proving such a benefit to himself and to the Nation. Let me make this point very clear, because it has bothered a number of my colleagues with whom I have talked in regard to this particular legislation. The farmer does not ask and does not want class legislation. Under the law an unlimited number of people can form a corporation and through their officers and managers can set the price on their output. This kind of corporation is considered as an individual under the law. A group of farmers can not organize with capital stock and safeguard their interests, because the law considers each one as an individual entity. The farmer has been legislated against rather than having had extended to him special privilege. The provision of the Clayton Act which permitted cooperative marketing among farmers can not under present business methods be fully taken advantage of, and this bill is framed in order to meet the situation that the farmers of this Nation are confronted with through the evolution of modern business methods. This Congress found itself in a most embarrassing position when it passed the deficiency appropriation bill. Under its provisions you appropriated $200,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, but you provided that "no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose of maintaining a fair and reasonable price for their product." It seems to me that such legislation little befits the wisdom of able statesmen. You tell the Attorney General that he must prosecute violators of the law and appropriate $200,000 for him to do it with, and at the same time you say there is one violator of the law that you can not use this money to prosecute, and that is the farmer.

It seems to me that this is legislation of the worst kind. If the farmer is in violation of the law, you ought to prosecute him and you ought to let him know that you are going to prosecute him. If his associations are necessary to his prosperity and in the interest of the public, then our laws should state that such associations are not in violation of the antitrust laws or the Clayton Act. From the position taken by this Congress the farmers of this Nation have a right to demand the enactment of a law that will clearly set forth their position. If the farmers are to receive continued protection, they should know it. If, on the other hand, they are to be adjudged criminals, the knowledge should not be withheld. After their long struggle they are entitled to know how the lawmakers are going to deal with them.

It seems to me that the right of farmers to act together in the disposition of their products is one of the simplest and most fundamental of their rights as producers. They are not asking for any special privileges and have not received any unwarranted consideration in the past. If anyone considers the provisions of the Clayton Act, as far as it relates to farmers' special legislation, it has already been done and is not the question that is now being considered in this bill. The farmers of this Nation are honestly trying to solve the problem of marketing their products and do not hesitate to accept the provisions of section 2. While supervision of this character has never been placed upon these organizations and the activities and records of farm organizations in the past would not of itself necessitate such supervision, I am persuaded from the viewpoint of the honest farmer cooperator that such supervision should not be resented. It would certainly cause the consumer to have confidence and trust in his organization, and might in the future prevent some group from bringing into disrepute cooperative methods.

The Secretary of Agriculture is at all times familiar with market conditions. His agents are scattered in every section of our country. His department is charged with the responsibility of keeping the Marketing Bureau efficient, and information is always available to him without additional expense. He is interested in encouraging increased production and has an equal interest in seeing that the consumer is able to purchase his food at a reasonable rate. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. And if there are to be any special privileges in the United States, should not the farmer have the first chance at it?

Mr. HERSMAN. He should have the first show. It is in the interest of the city man——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. HERSMAN to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed in the allotted time out of the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, 60 years ago men of high and generous opinion entertained radically different views about the most vital essentials of our governmental life. They differed in thought, they differed in discussion, they differed in attempted compromise, they differed even to the death. In the evitable conflict which was brought upon this country, now nearly 60 years ago, after four and a half years of as brave fighting on the part of the North and on the part of the South as the world has ever seen, the god of battles determined the issues of war in favor of liberty, union, and nationality, and there is no man I take it, North or South, who now does not appreciate the great wisdom of this stern verdict of the Civil War. [Applause.]

American men have marched to victory behind the Stars and Stripes in six great wars, and the present triumph of America is that the grandsons of Lee and the grandsons of Grant have fought side by side to protect the civilization of the world in the hour of its greatest peril. [Applause.] The forces of the flag have never met defeat. The United States of America is celebrating Memorial Day to-day—a beautiful day, a day brought to us out of the rigors and the terrors of the Civil War, but happily its purpose is now extended, and from coast to coast in the United States is recognized the valor of American arms. We pay tribute to the departed of their number with the sweet message of flowers. Self-denial, self-sacrifice, acts of heroism, are all recorded upon this one of the greatest of America's days, and now overseas, we see not alone a sympathetic regard but a recognition of the work of the men of the United States in the preservation of the great fight for human liberties in the world's greatest war. At this time, therefore, it seems to me, in this, the greatest legislative assembly in all the world, that it is meet and fitting to pay tribute to this great American day. Let us say with Webster, that we, the living, in paying honor and tribute to the heroic dead, stand besides for our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country, and in order that America, the unconquered, may remain for all time, America the unconquerable. [Applause.]

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this bill, it is an effort to give to the agricultural classes of our citizenship special privileges not enjoyed by the rest of flesh. I am opposed to it for that reason; and, contrary to the notion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS], I do not come from a manufacturing and industrial section of the country, where he thinks all the opposition to the bill must originate. The district I represent is wholly agricultural. The fact is that I am a farmer myself. You gentlemen smile when I say that, but if I were to say it where my constituents could hear me, they would laugh. [Laughter.]

I believe that the old rule is still good—equal rights to all, special privileges to none. I do not believe that the farmers of this country want any special privileges. I think all they want is that the law should deny to the other fellow special privileges. This bill, according to my friend from California [Mr. HERSMAN] is not an attempt to give the farmer any special privilege. I do not read it that way, and that is not what the report says. I call the attention of the Members to this remarkable language in the report. Denying that this is a special privilege, it goes on to say—

Instead of granting a class privilege, it aims to equalize existing privileges by changing the law applicable to the ordinary business corporations so that farmers can take advantage of it—

Whatever that language may mean. But there is no quesiton about what this language means:

Instead of granting to farmers a special privilege, it aims to take from the business corporations a special privilege—by conferring a like privilege on farm organizations.

Mr. Speaker, in order to take from business a special privilege, they propose to confer a like special privilege upon the farmer. What is to become of the rest of flesh? Mr. Speaker, this is simply an effort to give to the farmer the right to do that which we deny to everyone else.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, I submit. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK. I would not care to ask a question unless the gentleman has the time to yield.

Mr. HERSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to yield, if he does not object.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Would not the gentlemen permit me, first, to get out what is in my head? Nobody objects to the farmers having these cooperative societies. Nobody objects to their organizing, just as they have organized in California, under the law. The gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN] tells us that the almond farmers have already organized under the law, and that instead of getting one-fourth of the selling price they get three-fourths. That is, under the present law; and he said that if he had more time he could tell us the same story in respect to the raisin growers. We propose now to take the farmers out of the general body of sinners and create a special class for them, and tell them to go to it and that they will not be punished.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I am sure the country will be greatly disappointed. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, it has been said in this debate that the only remedy for a violation of the privilege granted is through the intervention of the Secretary of Agriculture. I think that statement is not warranted and is made under a misapprehension of the terms and effect of the bill. The bill provides in the first section that it applies to those—who are to engage in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing in interstate and foreign commerce such products of their members.

Permission is given that they may organize for that purpose, but it is also provided that they must comply with certain provisions in order to enjoy that privilege. Among these is a provision that they shall not pay dividends on their stock or membership capital of more than 8 per cent. If that or other provisions of the bill were violated by any such association, the bill would be no protection and they would be subject to prosecution under the antitrust act.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the act apply to any except those who have capital stock?

Mr. TOWNER. No; I do not think the provision relating to the limitation on dividends would apply to any except associations issuing stock to its members, but I am not sure about it.

The provision of section 2 is only an additional security against persons organizing ostensibly as producers but in reality organizing for handling and marketing solely for profit. It provides that in any case where information comes to the Secretary of Agriculture he may institute an inquiry, have a hearing, and, if necessary, issue an order against the illegal practice. From this order the right to appeal to the courts is given.

I think I am justified in saying that never was an improper use of a privilege more carefully guarded against than in the provisions of this bill. It would even appear as if unnecessary provisions were incorporated merely to make assurance doubly sure; that the only object and purpose of the bill is to provide that when cooperative effort is necessary to facilitate and increase production it might be authorized and protected. Again, it should be emphasized this privilege is not to dealers or handlers or speculators for profit; it is limited to the producers themselves. It is to say that those who produce the necessaries of life may cooperate with each other to furnish more and better food and clothing for the use of mankind. It may be added that in doing so they voluntarily limit themselves against undue profits or any imposition.

The bill is limited in its protective features to those who organize under it who are themselves producers. There is no protection given to organizations which merely deal in or handle such products. There is no protection whatever for a mere trading corporation. The purpose is limited to collective "processing, handling, and marketing" the products of those who are members. Who can say that such organization and purpose is not in every way justifiable? Who can say that it will not be an aid to production? Can there be any question but that such organization will aid not only those who are the producing members but also the ultimate consumers?

In order to provide against excessive profits the associations are limited to 8 per cent dividends. Are the corporations which manufacture steel thus limited? Are the manufacturers of woolen and cotton goods thus limited? Everyone knows that there are literally thousands of corporations doing almost every kind of business which have been and are making many times such profits, and there is practically no limit to their profits except the income and excess-profits tax. In this case the farmers voluntarily place this moderate and reasonable limit, so as to prevent any possible appearance even of profiteering; and yet gentlemen on this floor are opposed to any recognition of the farmers to cooperate in any manner or with any limitation. In my judgment this is both unreasonable and unjust.

It is remarkable that there should be manifested a spirit of antagonism against the farmers by those who represent the cities in this House and elsewhere. The prices of farm products which the consumers in the cities pay are at least twice what the farmer who produces such products receives. This more than 100 per cent increase between the farmer and the consumer represents the unconscionable profits which their own dealers receive and impose upon their fellow citizens. But instead of trying to limit the excessive profits of their own dealers to the detriment of the great body of their own consumers, these gentlemen blame all this high cost of living on the farmers, and when the farmers make any effort to reduce the immoderate profits of these middlemen, or desire by cooperation to increase production to the immediate benefit of the city consumer, the city representatives oppose their efforts.

It would be much wiser if those who represent city constituencies would realize that not only their prosperity but their lives are dependent on the products of the farm. Everything they eat and wear comes from the farm. Every comfort they enjoy comes from the farm. It will not be by opposition to the interests of the farmers that they can further their own interests. It will not be by discouragement, discredit, and abuse of the farmers that they will insure their own prosperity. It should be seen by all that our prosperity and the comfort and happiness of our people must depend upon the cooperation and friendly relationship of all, and that no class or portion of our citizenship can afford to build his own prosperity on the misfortune or discomfiture of others. "One country, one and indivisible," is not only a good political maxim, but it is a wise, economic, and business principle as well.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN]. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I think the real situation relative to this bill and why, in my opinion, it should not pass is expressed in the words or inquiry of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] propounded to the gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN], in which he assented, who said if there is a class in this country that should have special privileges, that class is the farmer.

Gentlemen, there was a time not so long ago, as I recall it, when the Standard Oil Co. alone had the honor of being the premier privileged class. Then the distinction fell to the Steel Trust, then to the packers, but to-day we learn on the floor of this House from the supporters of this bill, without blush or apology, that either by divine right or by desire the farmer alone has first claim to the honor and emoluments of the privileged class. In other words, the farmer has become the American aristocrat as well as autocrat.

Now, of course, such a claim is foolishness, is undemocratic, is utterly un-American. And yet the gentleman from Delaware has made that declaration.

This bill is drawn for the protection of the farmer, the ranchman, and men of their class. And while I know all here and elsewhere will bear testimony to the great place they occupy in the hearts of the American people, and if it were not for them it would be impossible for the great cities and manufacturing centers, as well as the smallest hamlet and township to exist, it is nevertheless true that the farmer owes a reciprocal obligation, respect, and consideration to his fellow countryman, for he can not advance and prosper without his aid.

This bill has some very pernicious and un-American features, the chief of which from a legal standpoint, in my opinion, is the one proposng to exempt from the present existing law relating to unfair competition and placing these proposed farmer organizations beyond its jurisdiction.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] has cited to you and read certain sections from the report of the committee in support of the bill. He read you where the supporters of the bill claimed that the corporations with whom the farmers are commercially related as agents or distributors have now under the law an unfair advantage of the farmer.

It is not the purpose of the farmers' organizations to come here or to their individual States and ask for remedial legislation. Oh, no! It is not so much that they complain what the commission merchant and distributor does in violation of the law, but they are asking you, and say very frankly in the report, that they want to be made a partner with them, in so far as they may have equal privileges to mulct the public.

The report itself sets up a defense denying that a special privileged class will be created by the enaction into law of this bill, even before the bill was brought out and before an indictment was made against it. The bill proposes to take from the courts the right of initial proceeding, and vest a quasi judicial power in the Secretary of Agriculture, who alone is the one person to determine whether or not a violation in restraint of trade or unfair dealing is had, and the steps which ultimately may reach a court proceeding consume 60 days at least, and may, as the law is now drawn, consume even a greater length of time. During all these preliminary steps which the Secretary of Agriculture alone may employ, the right to enjoin the offending organization of farmers is denied, and even the embargoing of the product of the complained of concern is denied.

Gentlemen, I have no grudge or ill feeling against the farmer; as a matter of fact I have had great respect for him. I have never quite agreed with those of his friends and supporters who delight in picturing him as the unfortunate member of our body politic, either in education or finance. It is my observation that he is a smart, sometimes sharp, clever individual, and in most cases well heeled financially; and when you come to deal with him, whether it is for his horse, a load of hay, or for his hundred-acre farm, you will find him on the job and well able to care for himself. I think the fact that he has succeeded in having this bill reported is a convincing argument for my contention for his shrewdness and business ability. I do not believe in special legislation, whether it is for the mechanic, the banker, the professional man, or the corporation; besides being unlawful, it is not in accordance with American ideals and is unwholesome to the growth of American business and industry and a deterrent and destroyer of peace and amity to our people as a whole.

I am opposed to the extension of Federal control where there is no especial need or where, as in this situation, the several States have provided by law for the situation complained of.

The fact is we have sufficient law on the statute books to cover nearly all matters for which we are asked to legislate. The gentleman whose name this bill bears has already sponsored and managed the passage of a bill through this House which to-day has arrayed one class of our citizens against the other, and this bill, if it becomes a law, in my opinion, will ultimately have a similar effect.

Gentlemen, I believe the purpose of taking the farmer from without the jurisdiction of the antitrust and kindred laws is to avoid the scrutiny and evasion of the standards of cleanliness and the reduction of excessive profits, which the thriving communities and large cities in this country find it necessary to invoke under the law, which at present controls the situation.

In the State of New York it is almost unbelievable to think, and yet it is a solemn fact, that when the milk producers in that great State were not attaining the proper sanitary standards in their product, and coupled with this wretched condition, charging an unfair price for their product, with sick mothers and suffering, weak children dying because of the poor quality of the milk and their inability to pay the outrageous price for it, sooner than accede to the demands made by the officials charged with the responsibility of enforcement of the law to correct the evil, these farmers threw into the highways and byways, as well as into the brooks, their milk, rather than sell it at a fair and reasonable price to these people so greatly in need of it.

I am opposed to this legislation for the above reasons, and therefore shall vote against the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, really the great problem of people to-day is probably, first, production, and, second, doing away with the present waste between the producer and the consumer. Everyone who has studied economics must be startled with the knowledge of the immense waste and cost to-day between the producer, either of foods or manufactured products, and the consumer. I do not know how successfully this bill may operate when it becomes a law, but it is an effort to make the producers of food products in the country, through combination and associations, which are necessary in some form, to eliminate a portion or a large part of the present admitted waste in the transportation between the producer and the consumer.

I represent the middleman. But I believe the present system is largely wasteful. While I do not know how far the farmer through association may be able to eliminate this waste, nor do I know whether he or the consumer will make the most out of the elimination of the waste, I do know that the experience of mankind is that wherever you eliminate waste between the producer and the consumer it is to the advantage of both and to the disadvantage of no one. [Applause.] Therefore I support the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am unable to understand or to appreciate the viewpoint of gentlemen who oppose the passage of this bill.

It is not the kind of measure in many of its details that I prefer. I do not think it is as good as the Hersman or the Capper bills. I am, nevertheless, for it because I think it is the best that can be obtained at this time. I am for it because the farmer wants it. I am for it because the best interest of the country demands it.

It will cost the Government nothing, it will benefit the public, and can hurt no one except the man who desires to control agricultural products for the purpose of speculation or profiteering. Its provisions simply enable those engaged in production of agricultural products, fruits, and so forth, to act together in associations, corporate or otherwise, with or without capital stock, in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and marketing, in interstate and foreign commerce, the agricultural products they produce. They do not handle the products of others or any commodity which they do not produce.

Some gentlemen profess to fear that such an innocent corporation, born of such humble parentage, may grow into a monster monopoly, restraining trade and lessening competition to such an extent that the public interest may suffer. It is as unreasonable as it would be to expect school-teachers to combine, withdraw their cash from deposit and circulation, and thereby precipitate a national panic. You gentlemen should know better; I fear you simply wish to protect speculation and to encourage nonproducers to act as public distributing agents when some of them would serve the public to better advantage were their energies diverted into other lines of activity.

Some of you who oppose the bill come from sections where monster corporations have grown powerful at the public expense. It might be that your time would be more profitably spent in trying to affect the passage of some law that would force them to pay into the Treasury of the country a portion of the enormous war profit which they have made during the past few years.

Gentlemen, there is no cause for alarm. Your rights are well safeguarded by the provisions of the bill. Should any association restrain trade or lessen competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof full authority for relief is provided.

The powers asked for in this bill are not unusual. Other governments have granted such rights without detriment to the public welfare. Some countries have enjoyed such rights and privileges for a quarter of a century. They still enjoy them and I have never heard of an instance where the rights of the public have been jeopardized by reason thereof. No one has ever heard of farmers forming such a monopoly as endangered the public good. If they so desired, their conditions are necessarily such that they can not do it.

Under present conditions the farmer who produces our food products sells it for about one-fourth of what it cost the ultimate consumer. The remaining three-fourths goes to the transportation companies and to the wholesale and retail merchant.

This bill provides a method whereby the producer and the ultimate consumer may be brought closer together and whereby waste may be eliminated. You can not eliminate waste without benefiting the public.

Our census reports show an enormous increase in the population of our cities. In some sections our rural population is also increasing, but nowhere in proportion to that of the cities. These conditions so alarm every thoughtful and reflective person that from every quarter there comes the demand for increased food production and the cry "Back to the farm." But, alas, no one returns! Why? You say because the city affords better social and educational advantages. This is true only in part. It is mainly because the mercantile and manufacturing interests of the country are in better financial condition than the farmer and can, therefore, afford to pay more attractive wages for labor.

I am not in favor of granting special privileges to any class; the farmer wants none. All he desires is an equal opportunity with others. He is entitled to this, and we should not withhold it from him. This bill will better his opportunity. Figuratively speaking, it will shorten the distance between the producer and the ultimate consumer. It will increase the net profits of the producer, and it will not cost the ultimate consumer a cent more. In proportion as we accomplish this it will increase production and solve the food problem for our too rapidly increasing city population. He who lives in the city should understand that one of its problems is the problem of the farmer. He is indeed blind who resides in the crowded city and has not sufficient vision to see and to understand that prosperous farms make more prosperous nations.

Mr. Speaker, it should certainly be refreshing to the American public to know that if any organizations are created under the provisions of this bill, there will be no water in the stock except that which falls from the honest brow of labor. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who admittedly represents a district of middlemen, explain to this House that collective bargaining on the part of the producer would have a tendency to benefit the producer and consumer of foodstuffs. I was tempted to compare his statesmanship with that of other Members who have appealed to Members to vote against this bill on the ground that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the author of the bill, was also the author of national prohibition. Think of the appeal to men to vote against this measure because the author of it is the author of a bill that some of your congested centers do not like. That appeal has been made twice. There is not any question in the world but that the consumer of foodstuffs to-day is suffering more from the fact that the producer has no equitable or fair system of marketing than from any other one cause, and that the producer is being hindered and stifled in the United States from that same cause no man can deny.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, of course it is perfectly evident that in the short time allowed for the discussion of this bill its principles can hardly be enunciated, much less discussed in such way as to materially impress the membership of the House with its unfairness to the great agricultural interests of the country, especially the cotton-producing section, which I in part have the honor to represent.

The fourth congressional district of Louisiana is an agricultural section, and as a Representative from that district I have invariably endeavored to determine what was to the best interest of the people whom I represent and have so shaped my course, as their Representative, as to protect to the best of my ability those interests.

In doing this I have heretofore had occasion to call to the attention of the House of Representatives the efforts made on the part of those representing other sections of the country to measures seeking to discriminate against the interests of the southern section.

Arriving from home last September a year, I immediately took up the question of fixing a price upon cotton, as there were two bills pending, one providing for fixing the price of cotton at 15 cents per pound and another bill providing for fixing the price at 20 cents per pound.

At that time I endeavored to make it clear that it was not to the interest of the people at large and was an injustice to the cotton-growing section to have either one of these prices fixed. or, in fact, for any price to be fixed upon this staple product of the South.

Up to this time this has not been done. Section 2 of this bill now under consideration, H. R. 13931, provides:

That if the Secretary of Agriculture shall have reason to believe that any such association restrains trade or lessens competition to such an extent that the price of any agricultural product is unduly enhanced by reason thereof, he shall serve upon such association a complaint stating his charge in that respect, to which complaint shall be attached or contained therein a notice of hearing, specifying a day and place, not less than 30 days after the service thereof, requiring the association to show cause why an order should not be made directing it to cease and desist from so restraining trade or lessening competition in such article.

This simply means that when an association of farmers organized for the purpose of marketing their agricultural products, upon seeking to obtain a higher price than some individuals think they should bring, they will be cited to appear before the Secretary of Agriculture here in the city of Washington to show cause why the price is not excessive.

Section 6 of the Clayton antitrust law, approved October 15, 1914, provides:

That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

This section was placed in the antitrust law after extensive hearings, due consideration, and earnest efforts on the part of those representing agricultural interests to have this provision enacted into law. Since that time farmers' unions have felt free to form associations for the purpose of marketing agricultural products without restraint, and it is deemed just and proper that a person who produces an article will be left in a position where he can place the article upon the market at such reasonable price as the public generally may be willing to pay for it.

Of course, under the antiprofiteering laws no one is allowed to sell a commodity at such an exorbitant price as to constitute an imposition upon the people.

If, as indicated, this bill shall be so amended as to recognize the right of the farmers to organize into associations not having capital stock or conducted for profit under the Clayton anti-trust law it will be greatly improved but will still have incorporated in it section 2, which provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may require agricultural associations to show cause why they should not desist from restraining trade or lessening competition on agricultural commodities, and if upon such investigation it shall be determined that they are doing so the case shall be submitted to the United States court for trial and determination.

While this bill provides for the incorporation of agricultural societies, and it is contended that it will operate to the benefit of agriculture, still in the second paragraph of section 1 it is provided that the dividends on stock or membership capital shall not exceed 8 per cent per annum.

Why this limitation to 8 per cent? Other business organizations are incorporated with full license to realize whatever per cent they deem proper in paying dividends. It is not just for this restriction to be placed upon farmers' organizations unless similar restrictions are placed upon other organizations.

For these reasons, if for no others, I can not support the measure.

As before intimated, it is my opinion that this investigation providing for the Secretary of Agriculture to make investigation is aimed principally at the great staple product of the South, cotton.

It is not meant by this to intimate that there is any prejudice against the interests of the South on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture. I believe that he is absolutely fair and impartial and will see that justice is meted out in all cases presented to him. This is clearly shown in a ruling which was made when the question came up as to quarantining the States of Louisiana and Texas on account of the appearance of the pink boll worm in some sections of these two States. Just as soon as it was known that this question would be passed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture I at once telegraphed, giving a warning to the people in the fourth congressional district of Louisiana that this quarantine would be established unless proper showing was made as to why it should not be. A strong delegation from my district came to Washington and, in cooperation with others from the State of Louisiana and the State of Texas, had a hearing before the horticultural board, at which it was shown that it was not necessary to quarantine these two States as a whole, and the Secretary of Agriculture formulated a plan by which the cotton interests could be protected and these two States be eliminated from the effect of a quarantine against the exportation of cotton, cotton seed, and its products, thus saving financial loss to these States and at the same time benefiting the cotton industry throughout the entire South.

It seems unfortunate that the spirit of sectionalism prevails in certain sections of the country and that a spirit of animosity against the South lingers in the minds of a few prejudiced persons who do not realize that the Civil War has long since ended and the animosities growing out of it are buried in the past. This animosity against our section of the country has cropped out in several instances during this Republican Congress, as is evidenced by the declaration of Mr. MADDEN, from the State of Illinois, on the floor of the House a few days ago, in which he characterized Gen. Robert E. Lee and his compatriots as traitors.

Under the rules of the House the Members have liberties which are not accorded to them in other places.

While this statement met with the reply denouncing it as false, and the word "lie" was vociferously uttered by many Members, it was not permitted under the rules of the House for the assertion to be repelled by physical blows.

The Member of the House from Illinois who made use of this uncalled-for statement in reference to Gen. Lee, the hero whom we adore, is said not to be a native American but born as a subject of England, and being adopted by this country is, no doubt, impressed in a similar way with reference to George Washington, the Father of His Country, who took up arms against England, and after a seven years' struggle succeeded, together with other patriots, in freeing America. He would, no doubt, also stigmatize Washington as a traitor if the occasion presented itself.

This spirit of sectionalism was shown when the woman-suffrage amendment was submitted to Congress. Section 2 of the amendment provides that the enforcement of the woman-suffrage amendment shall be left with Congress. This was clearly done because it was intended by the Republican Party to provide for the protection of the negroes in the South, as it has always been recognized as the policy of the Government for each State to enact and execute its own laws in matters pertaining to the right to vote, except in those instances where it has been sought to protect the negro.

As a further illustration of the statement above made in reference to the spirit of sectionalism, attention is called to the bill now pending in Congress, which has been reported from the Judiciary Committee of the House and is on the calendar for final passage, entitled:

A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching.

That this bill is intended as an attack on the South is clearly shown by the report from the committee, which includes a list containing the names of 74 negroes and 6 white men lynched from January 1 to December 31, 1919. This list gives all these cases as having occurred in the South and not a single one of them is reported from the North, only two being reported from Colorado, one from Kansas, and one from Washington, in the West. I will submit with my remarks a list of these cases which this report claims occurred in the United States in 1919. The report on this bill contains a diatribe against the people of the South, who are charged with lynching negroes for the outrages which were committed upon the females of the South.

This list is as follows:

A man whose cowardly heart and brutal instincts will prompt him to overpower and outrage a delicate, refined, and modest woman is considered in the South as beyond the pale of the law.

This statement is not made in advocacy of lynch law, but it is made because it is a fact that in the southern country the chivalry of the men is such that they would rather take the law in their own hands than see a lady who has been outraged by a brute forced to go into the court room in the presence of the gaze of spectators who are congregated through a morbid curiosity and there have to recite in detail and live over again all of the horrible occurrences.

There are other ways in which mob violence can be avoided much better than the one suggested in this bill, which provides for the transfer of cases from the State courts to the United States court and for the severe punishment of the officials in whose custody a man happens to be when he is mobbed and the municipalities in which not only the mob occurs but through which those passed who are engaged in the mob. All these cases are to be taken out of the State courts and transferred to the United States courts on trials for damages as well as for criminal punishment.

The better way is for all such cases to be tried rapidly and under a statute which provides for every safeguard of the accused, and the punishment to be swift and sure, as it is under military court-martial. But when the ravisher is allowed to delay his case in the courts and his punishment is delayed, it is not surprising that the people become impatient and demand speedy vengeance.

About a year ago a negro in the city of Washington—the Capital of this great country of ours—entered the bedrooms of three different young ladies in three different homes in the fashionable section of the city on the same night and attacked each one of them. One of them so vigorously repelled the attack that he killed her outright. For this offense he has not yet been punished, and a strong effort is being made at this time to save his life.

Only this week here in Washington at the Highway Bridge a negro attacked a man and his fiancée, shot the man, killing him instantly, and dragged the young lady off into the bushes near by, and while it is supposed that he will ultimately be punished for this crime there is a strong sentiment seeking to defend him.

How can it be expected with such examples as these, and many others which could be enumerated, that people will patiently wait for the tardy action of the courts and the law's delays in meting out punishment.

The report on this lynching bill casually refers to an incident which happened in the city of Washington about a year ago, in which many white men were killed by negroes, and if any of them have been punished it has not been brought to my attention. They seek to dignify this occurrence by calling it a race riot. Enough has been stated with reference to this, but I do not wish to close my remarks along this line without calling attention to the fact that in the South there is a protection for the negro equal to that accorded him in any other section of the country when he obeys the laws and keeps his hands off of the pure women of the South. This statement is not an argument in favor of mob law, but is made for the purpose of showing why the people in the South in many instances are so aroused to a pitch of indignation and wrath that they do not restrain themselves, and for this reason there should be enacted a law providing for swift and sure punishment for that class of offenders who are usually held to account through mob violence.

In commenting on this antilynching bill, which provides for the transfer of cases from the State courts to the United States court, it is proper to state that it is an infringement upon the rights of the States, and it will not be tolerated with any degree of allowance.

Francis Ferdinand, the Austrian Crown Prince, was murdered at Sarajevo, Serbia, by Gavrilo Princip in 1914. Austria claimed the right to take part in the investigation and punishment for the offense. Serbia stood back on her right as a State to investigate and punish criminal offenses, and the great World War ensued as a direct result.

There are times that people, although helpless and dependent, will rise up in their might and assert their rights at all hazards, and it is in the defense of these rights of the States that I protest against such sectional measures as the Dyer bill, as well as many similar measures which are sought to be enacted by this Republican Congress.

While 40,000,000 white people died either in the late war or as a result of that war, leaving that many more colored people in proportion, still the white people of this earth are in the ascendency through their intelligence, religious characteristics, and superior refinement; but we must bear in mind that the numbers of the white race are rapidly decreasing in the proportion which they bear to the colored races of the world, although the white race has doubled in population in the last 300 years, being now about one-third of the population of the globe.

The time may come when the various colored races may decide to combine against the white race, and with their experience when Japan overcame the Russians in that clash between the yellow and the white race, it is to be presumed that they will be encouraged to believe that they are invincible in such a conflict.

The sectional statutes which are sought to be enacted will naturally array the negro against the white man, and if a final clash should come between the races it is evident what position the negro race will take.

In the South he is treated with every consideration. The laws are enforced in his behalf just the same as they are in behalf of the white man. His school and church privileges are the same; his rights of property are respected; but he does not claim or expect social equality. The white man and the negro of the South understand each other and, if left alone to work out their own destiny, will have no trouble in living peacefully and contentedly, and nothing but sectional animosity and an effort to array the negro against the white man will ever cause the negro to rise up against the white man, and I do plead with the people of the North to lay aside any sectional feeling which they may have and reconcile themselves to the fact that no more loyal, patriotic people live on earth than those in the southern section of this great, united country of ours.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 11½ minutes remaining.

Mr. IGOE. And how much on the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventeen and one-half minutes remaining to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 6½ minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I want to say that I think I have supported in my service here every measure that has been proposed in the interest of the farmer. The necessity for this bill comes from the fact that in the Clayton Act the exemption is for cooperative associations without capital and not organized for profit but for the mutual benefit of the members. It was stated to the committee that the purpose in coming before them was to ask that the restriction against capital stock be removed, and if that was the question that was presented to this House to-day, then you would have the real question that is at issue between the farmers and the Government officials who are seeking to enforce the present law.

There has not been before the committee a representative who upon cross-examination was willing to admit that the farmers wanted anything more than the privilege of having capital stock in their cooperative associations. I say to this House if you want to meet that proposition all you have to do is to amend the section of the Clayton Act and strike out the words "without capital stock" and you have met it. But there are interests in this country who are hiding behind the farmers, and for some reason or other they have in their behalf the aid of the representatives of the farmers here in Washington. I believe the people who oppose the bill are more the friends of the farmer than those who are supporting it.

Now, what is the situation? If you will examine this bill, you will find in section 1 a provision which says:

> And such producers may organize and operate such associations and make the necessary contracts and agreements to effect that purpose, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, what was the situation in the California cases? It was that these associations when organized went out in competition with other business and other individuals, and sought to violate every law upon the statute books. They sought to put every competitor out of the business by price agreements. They sought to put them out of business by various unfair means and methods, and, finding themselves against the law, they come now and ask for this proposition. But when the attorney who represented them was before the committee and this proposition was put up to him plainly and he was asked whether he wanted that provision in the Hersman law, which has been incorporated in this, he said, "No; we do not. We want the right to have capital stock, and if we have that we are willing to abide by their law."

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. No; I regret to say I can not yield.

Here is the proposition: It is not to allow these farmers to cooperate and have capital stock. It is to allow them, after they are incorporated, to go out and do anything which any other corporation or individual can not do. Now, what is the effect of it? Take, for instance, the milk situation in the big cities. These people now have their cooperative associations without capital stock, but if they get this they can violate the laws against unfair trade, and they can go to the people who deliver the milk and say, "We will sell you our milk, but on condition that you handle our milk exclusively. If you handle any other we will not sell to you." And they can control the prices the distributor may charge. They can say to the distributor, "We will allow you to sell our milk, but you must charge a certain price and give us a certain price." And so the big packers of this country under this law, if they desire to do it, could organize the ranchmen of the country and say to them, "Now, we will distribute your product and make an agreement as your agent to charge a certain price," and under this law they are absolutely free from every law on the statute books—the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, the laws against unfair competition—and can go out in the country and take from the consumers as much as they want.

Let me tell you another thing, you friends of the farmer: If you get one of these cooperative associations in your country they can go to the farmers who do not want to come in and say to them, "If you do not come in we will break you." And I will tell you now that they are doing it in some of the States. They are doing it in the State of Michigan, where the beet farmers have gotten together——

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. IGOE. No; I can not yield.

Mr. SABATH. I want to say that what the gentleman said is true.

Mr. IGOE. I have been informed that unless they sell upon the terms of the association they have been threatened, and the gentleman can deny it in his own time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOCHT. I understand that in the process of this legislation there will be an opportunity whereby the producer will receive some measure of protection from what might now be characterized as the biggest grafters in America, the commission merchants of New York, Philadelphia, and other cities. Nearly every Member of Congress has received word from home, from those who go among the farmers and gather up produce and send it to the cities, that they fail to get any return, and we have been overwhelmed and besieged and importuned to relieve this condition.

That is one phase of it. Another phase is the protection that the consuming public will have with respect to the products of the farm. Notwithstanding the fact that we have cold storage everywhere, the farmers, or this combination, this union, whatever it is, or whatever you call it, will not be able to so conserve the products as to fix the price to an inordinate amount, for the reason that nearly everything, in fact, everything that is produced on the farm is perishable, and the first thing that a farmer wants is a market. He must sell his product, in order to get anything, at least some time during the year. Therefore he must dispose of his products, and the people will have in that one point and feature of the bill ample protection from any such thing as profiteering on the one hand, while on the other there will be no more grafting of the huckster such as has recently been carried on by the commission men, commission merchants of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Cleveland, Buffalo, Chicago, St. Louis, in fact, every city, by no means excepting Washington. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the declaration during this debate that agriculture is the basic industry of the world should find a companion truth in the declaration that the principle of collective bargaining by workers and producers is the basis of a square deal for both labor and capital.

I have the honor of representing the greatest city of the Southeast. I enter into every business man's legitimate purposes and rejoice in his legitimate success. But it is as clear as the light that if merchants and manufacturers and bankers have the right to assemble their capital in order that they may buy and sell and get gain, if the workingman in the city has the righteous right to assemble his only capital of the horns on his hands and the sweat on his brow to better his condition—and no man dare deny him that right—then surely the farmer, who works from daylight to dark to feed and clothe the world, must have the same right. [Applause.]

LEGISLATING FOR RURAL HAPPINESS.

My chief reason for being in favor of this legislation in behalf of farmers is because I want to see everything done for the farmer that can possibly be done to encourage agricultural life. I want to see farm life made so attractive from every angle that the stalwart young manhood of America will be glad to elect the farm as a life vocation. The drift from the farm to the congestion of city life is a dangerous, an almost fatal tendency in our American life. Production must be increased or the high cost of living will never come down. The world must be fed, the world must be clothed, and the ever-increasing demand for these necessities that must come first-hand from the soil furnishes the basis of a marvelous prosperity for the man who determines to dedicate his energy, his enterprise, his informed genius to the many-sided opportunities of farm life.

STANTON SAYS, "STICK TO THE FARM."

So appalling is the need of greater production and so fraught with danger is the desertion of the farm for the congestion of the city that thoughtful, farseeing men are gravely concerned. The patriotic question is asked on every side, "How shall we remedy the situation? What can be done by legislation or by general education to hold the purposeful youth of to-day on the farm? And what can be done to turn the tide of millions in the city back to the farm—literal millions who freeze in winter, faint in summer, and live from hand to mouth all the time?"

Certainly if these improvident millions who must be fed and clothed can not be induced to go to the farm and share the prosperity that would come from helping to feed and clothe the world, then it is an economic and a highly patriotic duty to legislate and educate in every possible way to make the sons and daughters of the soil "stick to the farm" and develop the farm more and more unto the fundamental prosperity of the individual and the Nation.

Frank L. Stanton, jr., of Atlanta, the gifted son of Georgia's beloved poet-laureate, the James Whitcomb Riley of the South, has inaugurated a thoroughly unique and workable plan of educational advertising, entitled "Stick to the farm."

It is suggested by him that the Department of Agriculture take charge of the movement and go after every conceivable agency in America to boost the campaign until the slogan, "Stick to the farm," articulates from every wayside fence and stump and stone and flash in blazing letters from the "burnished ceiling of the sky."

Thus the dangerous drift from the country to the city will be arrested, and by proper education, legislation, industry, and enterprise the farmer will indeed "make two grass blades grow where one was growing before" and gardens of roses shall blossom where thorns and thistles erstwhile grew. And thus the agricultural prosperity of the country will put its soothing hand on the fevered pulse of national unrest, sending from the happiness and contentment of rural life the inspiration of its schools and the purity and warmth of the "old-time religion" of its progressive country churches that splendid, God-fearing citizenship which must be the safety of America and the hope of all mankind.

DEMOCRACY AND CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION.

This argument growing out of my lifetime interest in the farmer—for I was born on a farm and chiefly reared between the plowhandles—ties itself naturally to my interest and pride in the constructive legislation of the Democratic Party.

This is not said in a narrow sense, but out of simple loyalty not only to the party of my fathers but to what I honestly conceive to be the fundamental principles of Democracy and good government.

It was a notable thing that lifelong Republicans like Henry Ford and Thomas A. Edison declared in 1916 that the Democratic Party, under the first four years of President Wilson's administration, had put more laws on the statute books that really reached and helped humanity than the Republican Party had enacted during its whole lifetime, and for that reason they left their lifelong Republican affiliations and gave substantial and enthusiastic support to the Democratic ticket. And, as a matter of information and history, I give here an epitome of some of the notable and practical legislation of which the Democratic Party is justly proud and for which the whole country, irrespective of political lines, should be grateful:

CONSTRUCTIVE LEGISLATION.

1. Currency reform: By the enactment of the Federal reserve act the industrial and commercial interests of the United States have been emancipated by Democratic agency from domination by special interests. The Nation was freed from the danger of financial panics and the foundation laid for the existing wonderful prosperity of the country.

2. Rural credits: The passage of the Federal farm-loan act remedied an imperative need entirely ignored by the Republicans for years and assures adequate means of providing capital at fair rates of interest for the further development of the agricultural resources of the United States and promises an annual saving to farmers of $150,000,000 a year.

3. Good roads: In the new Federal good-roads law, approved by the President last July, the Democratic administration makes available $75,000,000 for the development of highway systems throughout the United States under safeguards which prevent wasteful use of the money.

4. Tariff revision downward: In keeping with the platform pledge of 1912 the Democratic Party revised the tariff downward and put the Underwood tariff law upon the statute books, thus unfettering industry and commerce, depriving monopoly of its former control over production, distribution, and prices, and providing adequate customs revenue for the maintenance of the Government.

5. Income tax: The income-tax law, opposed by the Republican Party for a generation, shifts the burden of taxation from those least able to pay to those best able to pay.

6. Tariff commission bill: In this measure creating a tariff commission the Wilson administration takes an important step toward eliminating the tariff from politics and affords assurance of protection to American manufacturers against any emergency which may follow the close of the war in Europe.

7. War revenue: To meet the cost of "preparedness" the Wilson program increases the income tax, provides for an inheritance tax, and levies a special tax upon munitions of war. Many Republican Members of Congress have voted for this plan.

8. The Federal Trade Commission: This new commission in the year and one-half of its operation with signal success has supplied the demand for a tribunal to arbitrate commercial disputes, to prevent "unfair competition," and to do justice between the public and the great industrial corporations.

9. Direct election of United States Senators: A reform inspired and carried into effect by Democrats, which does much to restore popular Government at Washington.

10. Seamen's act and safety at sea: By a series of laws, chief of which is the seamen's act, working conditions of sailors in the American merchant service are improved and precautions are taken to avoid the fearful loss of life at sea that accompanied the Titanic disaster.

11. Revision of trust laws: In the face of persistent opposition of the special interests and at a time when the greatest international questions press upon the President and Congress, a complete revision of the antitrust laws was secured and is now in force.

12. Agricultural extension: Under the Smith-Lever agricultural extension act elaborate machinery has been put into operation by Woodrow Wilson that involved the expenditure of nearly $5,000,000 during the last fiscal year, a sum which will increase automatically year by year until 1922, for the dissemination of scientific knowledge concerning farm operation and management. This law is expected to double the productiveness of American farms.

13. Workmen's compensation: A model measure has passed both Houses and will extend this protection to thousands of Government employees.

14. Labor's magna charta: Laws have been enacted preventing the abuse of the injunction in labor disputes and legally declaring the labor of a human being not a commodity open to barter and sale like inanimate things.

15. Child labor law: President Wilson's personal intervention brought about the enactment of this important social-justice measure, which uses the Federal power to emancipate children from industrial oppression.

16. Eight-hour day: To the laws passed by the Democratic majority of the House in the Sixty-second Congress applying the eight-hour day to all work done by the Government, whether directly or by contract, has been added the act requiring the eight-hour workday for women in the District of Columbia.

17. Industrial employees' arbitration act: A law secured by the President that establishes the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation and affords the Government better facilities for preventing or settling great railway and industrial strikes.

18. Cotton futures act: Gambling in cotton is dealt a death blow by a cotton futures law enacted by Democrats after the subject had been evaded by Republicans for two decades.

19. Grain standards: A law giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority to establish official grain standards, simplifying relations between grain producers, dealers, and consumers, was enacted last August.

20. United States warehouse act: Warehouse receipts are made more acceptable collateral, which enables owners of stored products to obtain loans more nearly approximating the full value of their products.

21. Parcel post: This service has broken up an extortionate monopoly by private express companies and has been developed from a mere shell to the most gigantic, useful, and far-reaching express service in the world.

Gentlemen, you might as well "shell down the corn." That is a list of wholesome legislative achievements that will forever crown the Democratic administration that enacted them with a halo of statesmanship and practical humanitarian sympathy in action.

And then came the Great War, which we rightly tried so hard to avoid, but from which we could no longer hold ourselves aloof and preserve our national safety and our international prestige and honor. Under Democratic guidance it was a common challenge and a common victory. Let us thank God for the wonderful victory and face the burden and the future like patriotic Americans. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the chairman of the committee will offer an amendment, which I would like to take the minute in saying, in my opinion, will greatly improve the bill and render it more acceptable to the friends of the agricultural interests; and I mean by the friends of the agricultural interests those who recognize the paramount importance of doing everything properly within the scope of legislation that is possible to stimulate and encourage agricultural production.

At some future time I shall ask the privilege of addressing the House on that subject, which is of as much interest to me as any subject the House can consider. Meanwhile, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may give my reasons in support of this measure, I ask the privilege of extending my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for one minute.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration, H. R. 13931, is designed to promote the interests of the farmers of the country by vesting in them the legal right to form associations for the marketing of their products, a privilege that is denied them under present laws. The bill is therefore correct in principle, and should receive the support of every Member of the House.

The committee's report on the bill reads as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13931) entitled "A bill to authorize association of producers of agricultural products," having considered the same, report it with the recommendation that it do pass.

The object of this bill is to authorize the producers of agricultural products to form associations for the purpose of collectively preparing for market and marketing their products.

Section 1 defines and limits the kind of associations to which the legislation applies. These limitations are aimed to exclude from the benefits of this legislation all but actual farmers and all associations not operated for the mutual help of their members as such producers. Unless each member has but one vote in his association, irrespective of the amount he may have invested as capital therein, the association must not pay a dividend of to exceed 8 per cent per annum. This limitation of 8 per cent is designed to compel payment to the members of as large a part of the proceeds derived from the sale of their products as possible, instead of paying it as a dividend upon the money used as capital. A number of farm associations oppose the payment of any dividend on capital, while others insist that they need a capital and must have the privilege of paying dividends. Eight per cent was fixed for the reason that in many places money can not be borrowed at a less rate, and that hence a less rate would prevent some of these associations from obtaining the necessary funds to carry on their business. The aim has been to make the provisions of the bill sufficiently liberal so that all cooperative farm associations operated in good faith for the benefit of their members might avail themselves of the provisions of this bill. The bill does not, however, compel any association to change its present organization nor does it create any new organizations. Associations will continue to be formed under State laws as heretofore. In States where it is illegal to operate an association such as the ones permitted under this bill, it will, because of the nature of such associations, be practically impossible to operate under this legislation, as the bill only grants the right to operate in interstate and foreign commerce. That is the only power that Congress can confer upon such associations.

Section 2 makes applicable to these associations in a modified form the provisions of the Clayton Act. Briefly, it gives the Secretary of Agriculture power to prevent these associations from exploiting the public. In the event that any association should refuse to comply with the order of the Secretary, a suit may be brought in the appropriate district court to enforce his order. The farmers are not asking a chance to oppress the public, but insist that they should be given a fair opportunity to meet business conditions as they exist—a condition that is very unfair under the present law. Whenever a farmer seeks to sell his products he meets in the market place the representatives of vast aggregations of organized capital that largely determine the price of his products. Personally he has very little, if anything, to say about the price. If he seeks to associate himself with his neighbors for the purpose of collectively negotiating for a fair price he is threatened with prosecution. Many of the corporations with which he is compelled to deal are each composed of from thirty to forty thousand members. These members collectively do business as one person. The officers of the corporation act as agents of these members. This bill, if it becomes a law, will allow farmers to form like associations, the officers of which will act as agents for their members.

While this bill confers on farmers certain privileges, it can not properly be said to be class legislation. Business corporations have under existing law all the powers and privileges sought to be conferred on farm organizations by this bill. Instead of granting a class privilege, it aims to equalize existing privileges by changing the law applicable to the ordinary business corporations so the farmers can take advantage of it. Instead of granting to farmers a special privilege, it aims to take from the business corporations a special privilege by conferring a like privilege on farm organizations. It is no answer that farmers may acquire the status and secure the rights of a business corporation by deeding their farms to a corporation. That is neither practical nor desirable from any standpoint. Without doing that they can not associate themselves together for the mutual profit of the members without being threatened with prosecution.

New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and a number of other States have granted the right to form associations such as those contemplated in this bill. But these States can not confer any right upon their organizations to engage in interstate or foreign commerce. This bill is designed to grant that right. Associations of this kind are common in European countries and have been in operation for many years. Their effect has not been to raise prices to the consumer. In many instances the effect has been the reverse. They have tended to prevent much of the gambling in foodstuffs and to eliminate many of the useless middlemen that stand between the producers, the retailers, and the consumers. It is one of the chief problems of these associations to reach the consumer with as little expense as possible. Farmers ought to be given a chance to do that. The high cost of living can not be solved by discouraging agriculture. It must be solved by fair treatment of those engaged in that pursuit. To maintain his self-respect and the dignity of his occupation the farmer must be given an opportunity to deal in selling his products on an equal footing with those who purchase them. He should be given an opportunity to help solve in a rational and fair way the problems involved in the high cost of living.

The report, Mr. Speaker, fully explains each provision of the bill. As will be noted, the first section of the bill provides for the association of producers for the marketing of their products, which will give them protection against the gamblers in agricultural products, who rob the producer with one hand and the consuming public with the other. It also provides that the association shall not earn a dividend in excess of 8 per cent, which will protect all the members of an association against the possibility of a few of its officials getting control of it and consuming the profits to which the farmer is entitled by paying to themselves exorbitant salaries for conducting the business of the association.

Section 2 of the bill safeguards the interest of the public by giving to the Secretary of Agriculture power to go into the courts to prevent an association from exploiting the public, should an association decide to do so. Therefore, both the producers and the consumers are protected in their legitimate rights by the provisions of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the greatest menace with which the farmer is confronted to-day is the gambler in agricultural products, who plays no part in nor contributes to the production of those products. The greatest evil with which the consuming public is confronted is the profiteer, who exacts exorbitant profits upon the necessaries which the public must consume. The country is suffering more to-day as a result of these two evils than from all other evils combined, and they should be corrected by legislation as far as it is possible to correct them in that way.

The President requested the Congress some ten months ago to immediately enact legislation to curb the profiteers and gamblers in food products and other necessaries of life, who had become entrenched by war conditions, but his request was ignored by the majority party in Congress, which controls the legislative policy of both branches of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I venture the assertion, and do it without fear of successful contradiction, that if the Republicans in both branches of Congress, who have a majority in each branch, had devoted half the time to legislation designed to prevent gambling in agricultural products on the one hand and profiteering in the finished products on the other that they have spent in investigating and criticizing the President and the conduct of the war, all of which was done for their political advantage, the gambler in agricultural products and the profiteer in the necessaries of life would to-day be out of business so far as it is possible to put them out of business by the enactment and enforcement of law. Of course, everyone understands that it is impossible to enact any law that will totally prevent the commission of crime. Some men will commit infractions of the law regardless of the penalties for such infractions.

We have statutes against pistol toting, with penalties for violations of its provisions, but yet men carry pistols. We have statutes against murder, manslaughter, and assault and battery, and so forth, with severe penalties for the commission of those acts, yet men commit such acts. But they are not committed so frequently and so dastardly as they would be in the absence of any statute prohibiting the commission of such acts and punishing those who do so.

The bill under consideration, however, is a step in the direction requested by the President nearly a year ago, and I commend the Committee on the Judiciary for taking that step by framing and reporting to the House this bill. I only regret that we have not been given an opportunity to consider and pass other bills necessary to cure other evils in our economic system that have grown out of war conditions.

Mr. Speaker, the effects of this bill, if it becomes a law, will not be temporary, nor will its benefits be confined to the producers and consumers of the products that will be sold through the associations which the bill authorizes, but it will contribute to the life and prosperity of the Nation by increasing the production of the soil by providing for the tillers of the soil better and safer markets for their products. History will bear me out in the assertion that no nation ever ceased to exist as a nation except for one of two causes—first, by being overrun and subjugated by a superior power, or, second, by failure to produce from the soil the things essential to the life of its people. Therefore that which will increase the production of the soil is not alone of importance to the tillers of the soil but is of interest to the Nation as a whole, first, from an economic standpoint, and, last, but not least, by contributing to the life of the Nation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] desire to use the balance of his time?

Mr. IGOE. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. IGOE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret—coming from a great productive region, as I do, where my people are farmers and where a bill like this is offered on the floor of this House which is said to be a bill in the interest of farmers—that I can not see in the bill that there is anything on which the farmer may depend for any relief from the present conditions. This is, so far as the matter of government is concerned, a piece of class legislation, group legislation, pure and simple.

I have always adhered to the belief, and still adhere to the belief, that the great agricultural masses of this country do not want any special privileges, and they do not want the other fellow to have any. [Applause.] I have always felt that when the testing day came to this Nation as to whether or not it would be overthrown by virtue of legislation for groups of people and combinations of groups we should look back to the great agricultural masses which stand back there and hear them say, "We have never demanded a special privilege for ourselves, and we are going to fight special privileges to others." This bill violates that principle, and we have got to look to the farmers of this country to protect the Nation in the years to come.

Now, what does this bill do? Take section 2, where you put your power in one man. If he is a good man, he might not abuse that power; but it is a man that you are reposing upon and intrusting the power to. The Secretary of Agriculture is given the power to determine the proposition as to whether farmers are combining to profiteer in wheat, cotton, or other agricultural products. That is a power that ought not to be put in a governmental agency. It is a safe rule not to vest such a power by statute; and yet you are vesting that power here in the Secretary of Agriculture, a power over the destiny of the farmers of this Nation.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I can not yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Let me show you where you are putting yourselves. I represent a section that clothes the world.

Cotton is the great crop in my section. Other gentlemen here come from sections where grain is produced. Both of these great crops—cotton and grain—are more or less affected by the operation of the cotton exchanges and the grain exchanges. If I were a gambler on the cotton exchange I would ask you to give this power to the Secretary of Agriculture and let there be an organization formed to handle the cotton crop. Ah, how I would lay my plans if I were a gambler on one of those exchanges, and I would come to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I would hold the cotton farmers of the South up to scorn, and I would demand a hearing, and I would have everybody who wanted to consume cotton up in the air. Nobody would know what this man to whom you give this power is going to do, or what effect it will have on the men who are growing cotton in Texas. They have no market. It destroys their market. The same would be true as to wheat and as to every other great agricultural product, and when you write it on the statute books of the country you are giving the farmer additional trouble to deal with. If this is the last vote I ever cast on a great, important agricultural proposition, my vote shall be cast against giving this power, when I know of the manipulations of the gamblers on these exchanges and elsewhere who will take advantage of this power and always keep the farmers' market in an uncertain condition. The same thing is true as to cattle and as to wheat and the other great crops of this country.

But, to go back to my text, the only thing that I, the farmer, want is that I get no special privilege, and, in the name of God, give no special privilege to the other fellow. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not consider that this measure grants any special privilege to agriculture. It rather appears to me that it is only confirming a natural right which agriculture ought to enjoy, whose exercise is not inimical to the legitimate interests of other people. No farmer can compete alone with the conditions that surround him. We all know that it is economically impossible for any individual farmer to compete with the conditions under which he must live. When he buys from a merchant he buys at the merchant's price, and he has no power to compel the merchant to reduce the price. When he buys agricultural machinery from implement houses he has no power as an individual to exercise a voice in determining the price he pays for it.

When he sells his product, it matters not whether it be corn, wheat, live stock, tobacco, or anything else, he must sell it at a price dictated not by himself but by others who have had no part in its production. For that reason I favor the passage of laws that will enable him and encourage him to cooperate with others similarly situated in order that greater efficiency may be secured and in order that the farmer may produce that which must feed and clothe us under conditions that will encourage the greatest production and conservation. The world needs more production. It is essential. If production is to increase, the conditions of marketing the produce of the farms must be improved and simplified. This measure, we hope, will assist in accomplishing this result.

There are some things in this substitute for the Capper-Hersman bill, which is now presented by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], with which I do not entirely agree. But the bill is presented under a procedure that makes its amendment impossible, and I shall vote for its passage, in the hope that as finally enacted into law it may be instrumental in greatly improving the marketing conditions under which those engaged in agricultural pursuits are now laboring.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if I construed this bill in the same manner as many Members do, especially as those who oppose it construe it, I should not be inclined to favor it. I do not believe that the provisions of this bill confer upon the farmers any privileges which they did not have before. Certainly it does not confer upon any corporation organized by farmers any power which a corporation does not now have and which corporations are every day exercising. The bill gives them the right to organize for the purpose of marketing their products and authority to do any act which is necessary for that purpose. A careful examination of the bill convinces me that beyond that the bill gives them no privileges whatever.

The question may be asked, Why enact a bill under such circumstances? The reason is that the farmers are fearful to go into these associations because some of them have already been prosecuted under the antitrust laws, although those prosecutions have failed when it has been found they were merely entering into proper associations.

There is one provision in the bill that I do not like. The farmers are authorized to enter into these associations for the purpose of marketing their products, "any law to the contrary notwithstanding." This provision ought to have been stricken out of the bill. It is wholly unnecessary, and if it had any meaning I should not vote for the bill, as it would make the bill clearly unconstitutional. No law is constitutional that punishes one man and exempts another from punishment for the same act.

Mr. Chairman, for years I have made a careful study of the antitrust laws. Some 25 or 30 years ago I was a delegate to the convention to consider the regulations of trusts, which was held at Chicago. I have never believed in lowering or relinquishing any of the antitrust regulations. If this is done for one, it will eventually have to be done for all. If it is done for one class, it will encourage another class to come in and ask for the same exemption. In the end there will be nothing left of the antitrust laws. But no act provided for in this law is made illegal by the antitrust laws. Everything that an association can do under this law has been done for years by farmers' associations all over the country. In my own district we have had for years a highly successful and very beneficial association of the grape growers for the purpose of marketing their products. No one has ever dreamed of interfering with this association, and I would have had no hesitation in guaranteeing to the association that as long as they continue doing business in the manner in which they have heretofore carried it on that they violated no provision of the antitrust law. This association has been, and I have no doubt will still continue to be, simply an association for the purpose of marketing the products of its members. It has not been an association for the purpose of forcing up prices, and it has always offered its products for sale on the same terms to everyone. Consequently, its directors have gone ahead with a clear conscience, knowing that they were complying with the law.

Unfortunately, the Sherman antitrust law has been befogged by court decisions, and the farmer has, I think, been unnecessarily alarmed as to what proceedings might be taken against him under it. Instances were given of unjustifiable prosecution of farmers under the antitrust law, but I would not regard that as a reason for enacting this law. There are unjustifiable prosecutions under every criminal law. Some of them started in good faith, and some, of course, began through malice. The real reason for the enactment of this law is, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to encourage the formation of farmers' associations, in order to lessen the great cost of getting their products on the market, which is now altogether out of proportion to what it should be. I believe that when these associations are formed they will be beneficial alike to producer and consumer, and that if these associations are parties to any combination which is now unlawful, the provisions of this bill will not alter the situation in the least. If such a construction could possibly be put upon its terms—and I think it could not—then the courts would declare the bill itself unconstitutional.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is it on this bill?

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to revise the remarks I have just made on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I made some remarks on this bill last Friday, and I wish to revise and extend them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this bill. Under it I believe farmers will cooperate and will eventually eliminate the middleman, and by so doing they will bring their products to the consumer at a much cheaper rate than the consumer now pays and with a better profit to themselves.

This bill is, in substance, the Capper-Hersman bill. The object of this bill is to authorize farmers to form associations for the purpose of collectively marketing their products. We have a law similar to the proposed law in Wisconsin. The State laws can not confer any right upon their organizations to engage in interstate or foreign commerce. This bill will confer this right.

NEED OF LEGISLATION.

In the last few months more than 30 reputable farmers of the country have been indicted and placed on trial for collectively selling their milk for city distribution. So far, five trials of these men have taken place, and in each case the men have been acquitted. Farm organizations have been prosecuted in California, Minnesota, Illinois, and Ohio. In each case middlemen were responsible for the prosecution. In each case the farmers were acquitted by juries, but after expensive trials. It is a high compliment to the American sense of justice that the juries of laboring and business men sitting in these cases, after hearing volumes of evidence, and with the city press attempting to prejudice the case of the defendants, have quickly acquitted the defendants.

WHAT THE BILL PROVIDES.

This bill has the indorsement of practically all the farm organizations of America. It does not compel any existing farm organization or society to change its present organization. Associations will continue to be formed under State laws as before. The rights of the public are in every way safeguarded. The Secretary of Agriculture is given power to prevent any association organized under this law from exploiting the public, even if it was possible or the farm organization was so inclined. The farmer in the past has never been able to fix the price of the products he produced. The same corporations that fix the prices of farm products through the boards of trade, cold-storage warehouses, and other combinations of great corporations also fix the prices of everything the farmer buys. He is thus ground between two millstones. As a result, there is a great movement away from the farms.

DECREASE IN RURAL POPULATION.

Forty years ago in the United States 70 per cent of our population was a rural population. To-day only 35 per cent of our population live on the farms. The tax returns show that for every dollar of net income returns from the farms of the United States the manufacturers have returned $72. It is natural for people to seek the most remunerative occupation. This accounts for more young men going into business than becoming farmers.

In a speech that I made in the House of Representatives on the sugar question May 25, 1920, on pages 7614 to 7617, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I gave a list of a great many corporations that were making over 100 per cent yearly, and I cited a case of a coal company that paid profits in a single year equal to 78 times its capitalization. If a farmer made a net income of 100 per cent in a single year, it would mean that he could buy a farm, stock, purchase machinery as good as on the farm he made the profit from, and, if he was as successful as the coal company that made profits amounting to 78 per cent, he would buy 18 farms like the one he made the profit from.

PATRIOTISM OF THE FARMER.

The farmers of this country do not forget that 90 per cent of the Revolutionary soldiers were farmers, that 75 per cent of the soldiers from the North and South in the War of the Rebellion came from the farms and plantations, and that 50 per cent of our soldiers in the World War were from the country and cities of less than 3,000 inhabitants.

PRESENT ANTITRUST LAWS INEFFECTIVE AS TO GREAT CORPORATIONS BUT OPPRESSIVE TO THE SMALLER.

Our present Clayton antitrust law is ineffective as to large corporations. This law, which was intended to prevent price fixing by corporations, is violated daily by the large corporations. The law is used, however, to oppress farm organizations doing a legitimate and lawful business. For example: The United States Steel Corporation has what is known as the Gary dinner, which is annually held in Pittsburgh or New York. The heads of all the steel companies in the United States are invited to this dinner. Judge Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation, makes a felicitous speech, and in that speech suggests that the United States Steel Corporation thinks that $50 or $60 per ton for steel rails is a fair and reasonable price. There is no other agreement, but every steel company in the United States fixes the price of steel rails and other kinds of steel at the same price as the United States Steel Corporation.

GASOLINE.

We have a great many corporations selling different kinds of gasoline, and yet without any written agreement, but by simply whispering the word between the heads of the different corporations, gasoline companies simultaneously raise the price of gasoline. This price-fixing process goes on in regard to practically all the great articles produced by the large corporations of the country. There is no competition between these large concerns. The agreed price is fixed as effectively as though these concerns had signed a written agreement.

It would be impossible for the millions of farmers scattered throughout the United States to ever form a trust that would be oppressive. If it was possible for them to do so, the Secretary of Agriculture under this bill could dissolve the association.

COOPERATION IN DAIRYING.

By cooperation and the formation of cooperative creameries Wisconsin has built up the dairy industry second to none other in the United States, an industry which in that State alone produced over $300,000,000 worth of dairy products the last year. If it was not for these cooperative creameries and cheese factories, the packers and Oleomargarine Trust would have destroyed the dairy interests. When the settlement was made by Attorney General Palmer with the packers the dairy industry was excepted, and the packers were allowed to control the cheese market and embark in the dairy business in competition with the farmer, but not with the groceryman and other industries. This illustrates one of the discriminations against the farmer.

OLEOMARGARINE.

The manufacturers of oleomargarine have a bill in Congress each year which would take off the 10 cents per pound tax on colored oleomargarine and place a tax of 1¼ cents per pound thereon. This year the bill is known as H. R. 1032, introduced by Representative SABATH, of Chicago. The advocates of this bill maintain that the Government would increase its revenue by this tax and would also bring oleomargarine to the tables of people who can not afford butter, at a much lower price than it is now sold for. As a matter of fact, this bill if enacted into law would increase the price of oleomargarine by making it a competitor of butter, and it would sell almost as high as butter. Under the existing laws, with a 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine, the man who wants to use oleomargarine can buy the uncolored oleomargarine for almost one-half the price he can buy butter. If he desires to color it for the use of his table he can do so. The uncolored oleomargarine bears a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

UNCOLORED OLEOMARGARINE.

Ninety-seven and one-half per cent of all oleomargarine sold is uncolored and only pays a tax of one-fourth cent per pound. Only 2½ per cent of the amount of oleomargarine manufactured pays a tax of 10 cents per pound. If we should raise the tax to 1½ cents on all oleomargarine, as provided by the Sabath bill, it would immediately raise the price of oleomargarine 15 cents or 20 cents more per pound, because it would then all be colored and become a competitor of butter. Thus for every dollar that the consumer of oleomargarine would pay the Government in additional taxes, he would pay the large packing houses and oleomargarine factories from eight to ten dollars. When the cottonseed-oil people and the packers pose as philanthropists and ask the Government to tax them, the public should beware.

PURPOSE OF COLORING OLEOMARGARINE.

The purpose of coloring oleomargarine is to deceive the people. The same interests that are circulating an extensive propaganda attempting to popularize oleomargarine and telling of the impurities of butter, are fighting to prevent the passage of the bill allowing the farmers of the country to form cooperative societies. I have spoken against every oleomargarine bill that has been before Congress since I was in Congress, and I am going to continue to do so. Our dairy industry brings more wealth to my State than any other and demands a square deal.

FARMERS RESPOND TO CALL FOR PRODUCTION.

The farmers of the country, under the demand for greater production to supply our own people and our armies and the Allies, cultivated 32,000,000 acres more land in 1917 than in 1914. This production of food crops on an enlarged scale and at greatly increased expense of time, effort, and labor and by fewer men, did more to insure the winning of the war than any other one factor. During 1914 the United States exported 700,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of butter and cheese, and no condensed milk. During 1918 the United States shipped abroad 620,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of butter, and 160,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of cheese, and 1,770,000,000 pounds of milk in the form of condensed milk; 2,550,000,000 pounds of milk as dairy products used for foreign shipment.

In opposition to this bill I have had many petitions from the chambers of commerce of the larger cities. I have had many letters from individual farmers and farm organizations in favor of the bill. If the farmers are not given the opportunity to organize and do business collectively, they will be at the mercy of the middlemen and the large corporations that buy their products and then sell them to the consumer at an exorbitant price.

Our country is facing a serious crisis. People are flocking to the cities, and every census shows a very much larger per cent of people living in the cities than the country. The demand and need for food is constantly increasing. The labor situation on the farm also adds an additional problem. With the high price of building material, land, and machinery, it now takes a man of considerable capital to establish himself as a farmer. We should give the farmer encouragement in every way we can, to the end that our young men will find the occupation of farming profitable and offering as many advantages as business or the professions. The strength of our country depends upon its sturdy yeomanry.

EXTENSION OF RURAL ROUTES.

As an advocate for national aid for highways since I entered Congress, I have always insisted that along with the good-road movement the Federal Government should increase and extend its rural routes so as to bring mail and parcels conveniently near each farm. I have contended that there is no justification in delivering mail five or six times a day to the front doors of people living in the residential sections of the large cities, and compelling a busy farmer to walk one-half to 2 miles in order to get his mail once a day.

The parcel post has proven a great blessing to the rural population of the United States. It can not be utilized to advantage unless the rural carrier goes conveniently near to a man's house. I hope the day will not be far distant when every farmer will have a mail box in front of his home.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimus consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Army reorganization bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has six minutes remaining.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. After consultation with a number of gentlemen on this floor, I have thought it well to offer an amendment to section 2.

The object of the amendment is to preserve to the farmers what rights they now have under the antitrust act. There is some question whether section 2 might not take away some of the rights which they now have. There is no disposition on my part, and I do not think there was on the part of anyone, to deprive them of existing rights.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). Does the gentleman offer the amendment for information?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not for information; I offer the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the bill has not begun to be read. The gentleman can not offer the amendment at this time. General debate has not been concluded.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this is a House Calendar bill and there is nothing but general debate.

Mr. WALSH. This bill is being considered under a special rule, which provides that in the consideration there shall be two hours of general debate. Now, under that special rule I submit that it is not proper to offer an amendment during the two hours of general debate.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is nothing but general debate on a House Calendar bill. It is not read for amendment under the five-minute rule. The rule uses the term "general debate," but that is all there would be anyhow unless the rule provided otherwise.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. After the general debate, will there not be an opportunity to offer amendments?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No opportunity to offer amendments unless the House votes down the previous question. Then the gentleman could offer amendments, but not discuss them.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the previous question is not ordered, it would be in order to offer amendments?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would be in order to offer amendments if the House did not order the previous question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Will this vote be on the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; it is a call of the House, a point of no quorum being made. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and eighty-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The Clerk proceeded to report the amendment.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Under the rule that was adopted, is it in order for the gentleman from Minnesota now to offer his amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SABATH. Are other Members permitted to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER. If they obtain the floor.

Mr. SABATH. Can the Speaker inform me how Members can secure the floor to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER. By asking for recognition, unless the gentleman from Minnesota moves the previous question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reporting of my amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, the previous question was moved by the gentleman from Minnesota after he had offered his amendment. I then made the point of order that there was no quorum present. The reason I made the point of order that there was no quorum present was because the previous question had been moved by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the gentleman had moved the previous question, but the question had not been stated by the Chair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Volstead amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. VOLSTEAD: At the end of section 2, add the following: Provided, That nothing contained in this section shall apply to the organizations or individual members thereof described in section 6 of the act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, known as the Clayton Act.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and the bill to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. IGOE. The amendment is not germane to the section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment is clearly germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, the point is that the amendment is not germane. This section has relation to the bill which provides for certain associations that are organized under section 1. Under section 2 certain acts of those associations may be investigated. There is nothing here about associations organized under the Clayton Act or any of these other acts. These associations are to be organized under this bill, and the gentleman undertakes to put some limitations upon associations in the bill. Therefore the amendment is not germane to anything in the bill. We are concerned with one particular kind of association provided for in this bill under the terms of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill relates to certain associations provided for in section 1 of the bill. Section 2 of the bill thereupon provides as to those associations that certain authority shall be granted to the Secretary of Agriculture and to Congress. The amendment is that certain of those associations can not be operated upon by the Secretary of Agriculture, because they are now excluded from the operation of the law by the Clayton antitrust law. That is an exception within an exception, wholly permissible and entirely germane.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks clearly that this simply limits the operation of the section and must be germane. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I am desirous of moving to strike out section 2. At this stage of the procedure, would that motion be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order if the gentleman had the floor.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the House does not adopt the previous question; it will be in order.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. If the previous question is voted down then it would be in order for me to make the motion to strike out section 2?

The SPEAKER. Certainly. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. IGOE) there were—ayes 147, noes 62.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The vote is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Was the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota adopted?

The SPEAKER. Not yet. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the previous question.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, let us have the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman from Illinois asking for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment or on the previous question?

Mr. SABATH. On the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be too late.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman was on his feet demanding the yeas and nays on the previous question. There was a great deal of confusion in the Hall, and I have no doubt that the Speaker did not hear him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed that he had demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; he demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays on ordering the previous question. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-three, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. The Chair just a moment ago counted 233 Members present, and 33 are not one-fifth of that number.

So the previous question was ordered.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the amendment again read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been read the third time.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I demand a reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the request comes too late. The bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. I understood the bill had been read.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. Pass the bill with the amendment?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendment.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a second.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the request comes too late, because the bill has been already passed upon and amended.

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman has the right to demand a second. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 140, noes 34.

So a second was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve my time.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, when I had the floor before I started to ask some questions about this bill, but I did not have sufficient time. The first section of the bill is one of the most curiously constructed pieces of legislation that has ever been presented to this House. It undertakes to give something, and then in the second section it takes it away. In addition to taking away what is given by the first section it takes away practically the exemptions that were given to farmers by the Clayton Act. Now, I would like to ask somebody who had anything to do with preparing this bill what becomes of an association organized under the first section where a stockholder dies and the stock comes into the hands of some one who is not a producer? I would also like to ask what becomes of an association if some one who holds a share of stock should sell it to a nonproducer? There is absolutely no provision made for safeguarding the association. If these gentlemen mean what they said when explaining this bill, then the moment a single share of stock gets into the hands of a nonproducer, whether it is by operation of law or by sale, the association becomes an illegal association and may be prosecuted under the antitrust act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is asking a question as to persons who are concerned in the framing of this bill. Was not the gentleman concerned in the framing of the bill?

Mr. IGOE. No; and I would like to answer that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It seems a rather remarkable thing to some of us here that this bill should come in here with a unanimous report and should now receive such vigorous opposition from members of the committee.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that it comes in with a unanimous report, because there were objections to the bill, and some of us voted against it in the committee. If the gentleman served on the Committee on the Judiciary, he would be familiar with the fact that all bills reported by that committee are not framed by the committee.

Mr. HERSMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me to answer the question?

Mr. IGOE. When I answer the gentleman from Ohio I will yield to the gentleman from California. This bill as originally drawn was known as the Capper-Hersman bill, prepared or introduced, rather, by Senator CAPPER in the Senate, and in the House by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN], and a duplicate by Mr. BARBOUR. Both gentlemen from California are very much interested in the welfare of associations that are organized out in California, where they have carried this cooperative business, perhaps, to the highest point of efficiency, and also in some instances to the nearest point of monopoly. When those bills came in we had hearings on them, copies of which I hold in my hand. The next that we heard of the bill was when the gentleman from Minnesota introduced a bill, not the Capper-Hersman bill, but the Volstead bill. Three days later another bill was introduced by Mr. VOLSTEAD. That bill came into the committee, and while we can not say what happened there I can say it was but a few minutes after the bill was presented to the whole committee when it was voted out without any amendment, without any discussion, without reading for amendments, and reported to this House for consideration.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IGOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BEE. Will section 2, vesting power in the Secretary of Agriculture, be of full force and effect if the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is adopted that takes it under the operation of the law——

Mr. IGOE. I have not examined the amendment closely enough, but in my judgment it is a strange proceeding when you distinguish between an association organized under the Clayton Act and an association organized under this act, but here is what will happen: Just the moment a clamor goes up in the country about the cost of any product of the farm, whenever you have a clamor such as we have had in the last 12 months, there is not a Secretary of Agriculture but who will be compelled to make an investigation, and then he will have to go into the business of every cooperative association in the United States, and after he has summoned the officers here and after he has examined all the books, after he has found out the nature of their operations, then he will be able to determine whether they are organized with or without capital stock. How, then, does the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota relieve an association which is legal under existing law from being harassed under section 2?

Mr. HERSMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I will.

Mr. HERSMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman, first, if he is concerned for the interest of the farmer in stating that the Secretary of Agriculture will investigate these——

Mr. IGOE. Oh, I am deeply concerned about increasing production, and I am concerned about giving to the farmer a right to legitimately form cooperative associations, but I am not willing to give the farmer, the labor union, or the manufacturer a right, as you give under this bill, to violate all the laws of the United States that are binding upon other individuals and other corporations.

Mr. HERSMAN. The first question the gentleman asked was, What becomes of an association of which one member dies?

Mr. IGOE. What does become of it?

Mr. HERSMAN. I will tell you about it. In California——

Mr. IGOE. Oh, I am asking what becomes of it under this bill?

Mr. HERSMAN. I am going to tell you what becomes of it in California and under this bill.

Under the laws of California you can make an agreement to buy that stock. All the cooperative associations can preserve their entity as cooperative associations purely and have an option to buy all that stock before a man can sell it.

Mr. IGOE. What becomes of the farmer then?

Mr. HERSMAN. They have a right to buy that back.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Assuming that this bill was a law, and take a concrete case as to a crop with which I am familiar; suppose there is an organization of cotton farmers who produce cotton, and they are putting that cotton on the market in the fall season; now, there is another element of people who want cheap cotton through the exchanges or otherwise; what would be the effect on the local market, and what would be the effect of the price of the farmer's cotton if these people interested in beating down the price should file a sworn case before the Secretary?

Mr. IGOE. It would ruin the market.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Would there be any market?

Mr. IGOE. Of course there would not be.

Here is a curious thing. Some of the gentlemen who want this are milk producers—dairymen who are associated together—and they are complaining now because they say that under the Clayton Act the district attorneys ask them about their business and how they do it, and they want something written into the law to make it certain that they can not be asked about their business. And so the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] by section 1 assumes he meets it. But in section 2 he gives the Secretary of Agriculture the right to go and pry into their business every time he feels like it. I am objecting to the provision in this bill, gentlemen, most of all, in section 1, lines 8 to 11. That is the part I want to get this House to vote on, because there is not any question in the world but that it allows them not only to organize but after they are organized to go and violate all the laws against trusts, monopolies, and unfair trade.

Here are some questions that we had before the committee. I asked the attorney from California, Mr. Sapiro, who is a bright, clever gentleman, the following questions:

I am simply asking you if the broad exemption in Mr. HERSMAN'S bill was thought necessary by you.

Mr. SAPIRO. The only exemption should be as to contracts between the grower and the association.

Mr. IGOE. According to the language, Mr. HERSMAN is going to allow them to roam around through the United States and do anything they want in restraint of trade. That is the language of his bill.

Mr. SAPIRO. That is probably just loose language there. I am certain he had in mind the preliminary contract between the association, as such, and its growers.

Mr. IGOE. I was trying to get from you what you thought was absolutely necessary for the proper functioning of this association that you referred to.

Mr. SAPIRO. The way we have covered it is to say any such organizations or the members thereof, or the contracts made between such organizations and its members or stockholders shall not be held to be illegal.

That, however, is not what this bill says. This bill allows them to organize with capital stock, and then to go out as a corporation and do anything they want without regard to any law.

Now, let me tell you what was done out in California. The brief I have here was filed with the Federal Trade Commission and refers to the fact that one of the raisin companies went out into the trade and indulged in every sort of practice that would do credit, or discredit, to the Standard Oil Co. or any other trust. Among other things, they made a contract with a distributing company by which the distributors took the product of the raisin company at a certain price and agreed not to handle the product of any rival growers. In the course of time they could put anybody out of business.

Mr. BARBOUR. Was not that a case of fighting the devil with fire?

Mr. IGOE. I do not say they did not have a hard time. But let me tell you something. This bill affects all the people of the United States, and the people who are fighting each other with fire in California may be the same kind of people who are found throughout the United States jointly imposing upon the unprotected consumer. The consumer is not the millionaire, but he is the farmer also, and in many cases it is the farmer who will suffer by this bill. They can go to the farmer, as they did in California, and say, "You come in and join us or you can not do any business." And if this cooperative association goes to do business with the ultimate salesman or middleman, it can say to him, "You handle our stuff, but nobody else's," and they can put the independent farmer out of business.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not desire to criticize these gentlemen, but does not the gentleman think it bad practice for a great committee such as the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, of which he is the ranking minority member, to report a bill of this importance to the House without any suggestion that amendments would be offered? I learned from members of the Rules Committee that no suggestion was made that the bill was not unanimously reported.

Mr. IGOE. I will say that the committee never asked for any rule officially. The chairman did it himself.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The House, it seems to me, should be informed, where a bill of this importance comes in with a unanimous report, that the bill has not unanimous support.

Mr. IGOE. There is no unanimous report. We offer a good many suggestions usually, but this bill went through the committee in a great hurry. I never knew until after they went before the Rules Committee that a rule was to be asked for. I voted against the proposition to suspend the rules the other day, and you have a motion here to suspend the rules, and I am against it.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to special legislation or legislation in behalf of any special class and I would oppose this measure if I believed it would operate to exempt farmers from the provisions of a just law, properly intended to include them. Organizations such as is contemplated by this measure have been considered by some as contrary to the letter of the antitrust law, but I believe that no one who knows anything about organizations of this kind or such as would be possible under this bill would consider them contrary to the spirit of that law. Those who oppose this bill say it will put farmers in a special, exempted class. I do not consider this will operate as an exemption from the antitrust law. I do not consider it as an exception at all. I consider it as a definition of what are not objectionable organizations; a definition of entirely safe and proper organizations which are not intended to be included and which are not in fact included in antitrust laws.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN] a few minutes ago said, as I understood him, that if this bill shall become law it will conflict with antitrust laws of the States and thereby cause confusion. In many of the States there are antitrust laws and overzealous officials in some of the States have caused the arrest of officers of farm organizations and prosecutions have followed. But in each instance, as far as my knowledge extends, the court after full trial determined that farm organizations, the same as contemplated here, are not contrary to the antitrust law of the State in which the trial was had. A trial was had in the gentleman's own State, New York. Milk producers were arrested, or rather, officers of milk producers' associations were arrested. What for? Not for combining in restraint of trade, not because they undertook to monopolize the trade, not because they tried to fix unreasonable prices, but because the farmers, acting through the officers of their associations, were carrying on business with dealers in one of the great cities of that State.

It developed on the trial that the farmers, through their dairy organizations, were asking and receiving 7 or 7½ cents a quart for their milk, while the dealers in the city were distributing and selling it to consumers at from 15 to 18 cents a quart. Consumers of the milk believed the farmers were responsible for and were receiving these improperly high prices, whereas the farmers, by negotiation through their officers with the city milk dealers, had simply obtained the best price the dealers would pay; that is, the market price. They did nothing by way of fixing the price; they sold for the available price.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Pardon me; I can not yield in my time.

The same situation developed when farmers and dairymen in the vicinity of the city of Cleveland were arrested. Officers of the association were arrested, taken from their beds at the dead of night, and thrown into jail. On the trial the dairy officials were acquitted. There was the same kind of trial with the same result in Chicago following the arrest of officers of a dairy association composed of Illinois farmers.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The chairman of the committee gives me one additional minute, in which time I wish to say that in the cities where farmers have been arrested, charged with violation of antitrust laws of the States, in each one it was determined after trial that they were not acting in violation of law. And in one or two of the States in which such organizations of farmers seemed to be a violation of law the governors promptly called special sessions of the legislatures, and the legislatures amended the law so as to permit the organization of such associations. And in other States, at the next regular session, amendments of the laws of those States along the line of this bill were passed by the legislatures. [Applause.] The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE] charges that the Committee on the Judiciary has improperly failed and refused to report out the original Capper-Hersman bill, which was so generally approved by farmers and farm organizations. The fact is, and the gentleman must know it, that after long hearings and full consideration the bill we are now considering was substituted for the Capper-Hersman bill, and substitution was with the entire approval of the authors of the original bill and with approval of farm organizations which appeared before the committee. Mr. HERSMAN has himself spoken here in support of this bill, and a few days ago, when I was before the Committee on Rules of the House urging a rule by which this bill might be considered and passed at this session, Mr. Loomis, secretary of an association representative of farmers and farm organizations, including the National Grange, was before the Rules Committee and expressed approval of this bill on behalf of the organizations he represents. So this bill is acceptable to farmers; they believe it will enable them to market their products better than they can now; and that by better marketing they will be able to get a larger part of the prices paid by consumers. They wish to operate properly and always within the law.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made an inquiry about this bill, and referred to the fact of there being a unanimous report upon it. I consulted Webster's Unabridged Dictionary and found under the word "prudential" this quotation:

> My lord admiral had a prudential eye to the main chance.

This explains the sudden disappearance of the Capper-Hersman bill and the Barbour bill and all other bills on which hearings were had before the Committee on the Judiciary. The only bills on which hearings were had were bills that were heard in October, 1919. No hearings were had on this bill, which now comes out "for prudential reasons" under the name of the Volstead Act. That answers the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Now, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that we find ourselves face to face, by the extraordinary process of the suspension of the rules, with the consideration of a bill which should be amended, and yet which under this rule we have no power to amend. We set aside the bill introduced by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR] and the bill introduced by another gentleman from California [Mr. HERSMAN], and the bill of Senator CAPPER, on which hearings were had; and I pause long enough to say that I hold in my hand a motion to recommit, which I intended to offer under the parliamentary practice, which I would have offered under the ordinary rules of procedure, submitting to the House the so-called Capper-Hersman bill; a motion to recommit embodying the entire Capper-Hersman bill, which was also, I belive, the bill of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR]. And yet under the extraordinary rule—the rule which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so well said on Saturday was a rule that the Republican majority would find themselves facing, we are now up against just what he said would occur, and that is the consideration of measures without the power of proper amendment.

Here is a bill which should be amended. It has good features, and many Members want to vote for it. But it should be amended. Yet it is an unconsidered bill, a bill upon which no hearings were had, a bill upon which no opportunity was given for a minority report, a bill upon which the committee as a committee never asked for a rule from the Committee on Rules. None of these parliamentary processes were ever indulged in with respect to it. None has ever been asked. And yet under the extraordinary process of the suspension of all rules we now come in, we throw aside the hearings, we throw aside the considered merits of the Capper-Hersman bill and of the Barbour bill, and we present to this House an unconsidered bill, an ill-considered bill, without the slightest opportunity for amendment.

I have asked the gentleman in charge of the bill——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, public morals, crystallized into the common law, condemned as illegal every combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade. This doctrine was recognized and reinforced by the Congress when it passed the Sherman law and the Elkins Antitrust Act. More recently there has crept into our laws an exception as to those who market foodstuff, whereby the latter are exempted from the operation of the statute, but they are subject to the provisions of the Lever Act, which gives the President power to regulate the price and distribution not only of food supplies but also of fuel and clothing. That power has not been exercised in the direction of reducing the cost of these necessaries of life. The President intervened as to coal and fixed the price of that commodity below the average cost of production. The price of wheat was also fixed by law. But as regards cotton, sugar, and rice grown in the South, there was no regulation as to price. Thus favored by the administration and immune from prosecution, the southern planters shrewdly combined, and as a result the prices of cotton goods, sugar, and rice have been quadrupled. As a further result, a great cry—the combined voice of millions—has gone up, denouncing the profiteer and calling upon Congress to do something to reduce the cost of living.

Great numbers of our people are sorely pressed from the extortions that are being practiced upon them. In the presence of the nation-wide affliction of high prices, men have the audacity to ask me to support this measure. If the bill should become law the practices denounced as immoral at common law, and made criminal under previous laws of Congress, would be legalized, and the price-fixing of food and raiment validated. The country would see organized, under the terms of the act, gigantic food and clothing trusts, vested with power to charge whatever their sweet will dictated and to grind under their iron heed every family in the land. The giants thus unchained would be harnessed up, not by farmers—the honest yeomanry of the country—but be harnessed up and manipulated by the same men—the profiteers—who now have their felonious fingers in the pockets of the people.

No farmer or farmer's organization has asked me to support this bill. I would be glad to support any measure that would encourage or assist the farmer, for his hardships are many. This I know from experience, but I will not vote to make lawful that which, by its very nature, is unlawful.

The question is, How far are we going to permit demagogy in this House to proceed? Shall we make abortive every effort of Congress, the country, and the administration to reduce the high cost of living? Shall we put into the hands of men the absolute, consummate power to charge for the necessaries of life whatever they may want to charge?

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. I will yield.

Mr. KEARNS. I wish the gentleman would suggest to the House what effort the Department of Justice has made to cut down the high cost of living.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Well, the department has made a little headway. Recently the department caused to be indicted a grocery jobbing company organized in my State for buying six carloads of sugar at 14 cents and selling the same at 30 cents per pound.

Mr. KEARNS. When did the company buy the sugar at the price of 14 cents per pound? The Department of Justice gave the sugar producers the right to charge 18 cents per pound.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The sugar was bought by the jobber long ago, but delivered and resold at a date quite recent. The Attorney General by his own hand wrote the bill to amend the Lever Act and sent the same here and we passed it—my recollection is without any change in the language. If the law does not have teeth in it, or if the law is not being enforced, it is not the fault of Congress. The blame is chargeable to the administration, of which the Department of Justice is part, and not to us. Congress can make law, but it has no power to enforce it. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word. It is suggested that the Capper-Hersman bill was thrown in the wastebasket. Senator CAPPER has introduced this very bill in the Senate, and Mr. HERSMAN has spoken to-day in favor of the bill. Every organization that was back of the Capper-Hersman bill is, so far as known, back of this bill. An appeal for the passage of the Capper-Hersman bill is an appeal for the defeat of all legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not yield now. It seems to me that we ought to treat the farmers fairly instead of sneering at them, as some have done in this debate. They ought not to be prosecuted nor persecuted for doing the only thing that will give them a fair deal. We only ask that they may be given the rights that they are accorded in every other country. Congress ought to have the fairness to insist that they be given the means to protect themselves, so a few middlemen do not rob them of their profits. The commission merchants are the ones that are making the profits now and fighting this bill. Can you afford to ignore the demand of the farmers for this legislation and suffer so great and vital an industry to be exploited by these men? You are not going to do it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. What is the legislative status of the present bill if the motion to suspend the rules does not pass, it having been considered under a rule?

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to suspend the rules and pass the bill it stands with the previous question ordered for a third reading.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 234, nays 58, answered "present" 3, not voting 132, as follows:

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CANTRILL, is absent, but he has authorized me to state that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the same request. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REVENUES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 7158, the so-called half-and-half bill for the District of Columbia, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the half-and-half bill, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if this bill does not make permanent law the old half-and-half system of taxation?

Mr. MAPES. It does not.

Mr. BLANTON. Does it carry out the gentleman's idea of what taxation in the District of Columbia should be?

Mr. MAPES. The Senate amendment does not.

Mr. BLANTON. What does the Senate amendment do, if it does not restore the old half-and-half system?

Mr. MAPES. The Senate amendment repeals the existing law which limits the estimates of the commissioners to twice the estimated revenue raised by taxation in the District of Columbia and provides for a changeable tax rate, depending upon the budget.

Mr. BLANTON. If the Senate amendment should be adopted by the House conferees, then would the Government of the United States continue to pay half the expenses of running the District of Columbia, as has been done heretofore?

Mr. MAPES. If the House conferees and the House accepted the Senate amendment, it would.

Mr. BLANTON. Is there any chance of the House conferees accepting the Senate amendment without giving the House a vote on it?

Mr. MAPES. I do not imagine there is.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman agree to give the House a chance to vote on the matter before he accepts the Senate amendment?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, I do not think there is any occasion for making such an agreement. The conferees know the attitude of the membership of the House on the question, and, personally, they are as much opposed to this half-and-half principle as anyone.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received a telegram announcing the death of Hon. Thomas W. Bradley, my predecessor in Congress. He was an honored Member of this House for 10 years, 1903 to 1913, and died at his home at Walden, in Orange County, N. Y., where he has been living since his retirement. Col. Bradley was a veteran of the Civil War and a medal of honor man, having received his medal of honor for gallantry on the field at Chancellorsville, where he volunteered, though only a boy of 17, to go forward toward the Confederate lines and to take from a fallen mule ammunition cases which had been strapped to the mule and bring them back under fire. According to the medal of honor book, during part of the time that he was coming back, carrying the ammunition cases, he turned around and faced the foe, walking backward. The Confederate soldiers, always admiring bravery, ceased firing at him and cheered. [Applause.] It seems particularly fitting that such a soldier should have died on Decoration Day.

Col. Bradley was born in England in 1844. He came to this country at the age of 2 years. He enlisted in the One hundred and twenty-fourth New York Infantry as a mere boy and returned a captain before he was 21 years of age. He was wounded in battle three times, at Gettysburg, at the Wilderness, and at Boylton Plank Road. He became after the Civil War a successful manufacturer of knives, and, entering politics, served several terms in the New York State Assembly before his election to Congress. In the House of Representatives he served on the Committee on Invalid Pensions and on the Committee on Military Affairs. Many Members of this House remember him, and many have spoken to me about him in terms of warm friendship and affection. He was a man of peculiarly lovable disposition, the idol of the people of his home town and county, and at the same time a man of strong convictions and sturdy character. I want to make acknowledgment here before men who know him that I personally owe much to his friendship and kindly advice.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on May 29 they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 11960. An act making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921; and

H. R. 13416. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 2. An act to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2279. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Humboldt National Forest;

S. 4435. An act to authorize officers of the naval service to accept offices with compensation and emoluments from Governments of the Republics of South America; and

S. 4259. An act to provide further for the relief of war minerals producers and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war and for other purposes," approved February 2, 1919.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 4435. An act to authorize officers of the naval service to accept offices with compensation and emoluments from Governments of the Republics of South America; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

S. 4259. An act to provide further for the relief of war minerals producers and to amend an act entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," approved February 2, 1919; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

S. 2279. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Humboldt National Forest; to the Committee on Public Lands.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FREEMAN, until further notice, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill which has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

SEQUOIA NATIONAL PARK, CALIF.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5006) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt National Park.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, are we now proceeding with the call of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent by virtue of the suspension rule that we passed?

The SPEAKER. We are.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. The gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON], in charge of the bill, is away with the Indian Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill has been on the top of the calendar for a long time. Are we to continue it there, or is it going to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. SINNOTT. I would like to have it continued until the gentleman returns, as he has been negotiating with the Forestry Department and the Park Service concerning the matter.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman return before the 5th?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he will not.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no information about that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will ask that the bill go to the foot of the calendar the chances are that nobody will object to it, but if he is going to keep it at the head of the calendar there may be objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman insists, then I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice, to go to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BUILDINGS AT CAMP FUNSTON, KANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3706) authorizing the Secretary of War to make settlement with the lessees who erected buildings on a five-year lease on the zone at Camp Funston, Kans., and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this seems to be a rather important measure. I have forgotten just how much it involves. Can the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] give us that information?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be a great amount involved in this bill. The bill as it passed the Senate authorizes the Secretary of War to adjust the damages these lessees have suffered. They are men who erected buildings on the zone at Camp Funston for mercantile pursuits and amusement enterprises for the soldiers at the camps. They were given a five-year lease. They erectsd these buildings at their own expense. After a lapse of about three years they were ordered off the reservation. The Government is now occupying the buildings, and the lessees are asking that they be recompensed for the amount they have lost, for the balance of their lease—that is, the amount they have lost in the construction of the buildings.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Under this bill will these people be permitted to claim a recovery for prospective profits?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think so.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Is there any doubt about it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, the War Department——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, I wish the gentleman would wait a moment and let me answer the question. The War Department has consistently ruled in adjusting all of the large contracts growing out of the war that they will not allow anything for prospective profits, and we assume that they will not change their policy.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman explain why he answered my question by saying that he did not know whether they would or not?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to tell what the Secretary of War will do. It is to be assumed that he will do the sensible thing. He has not paid prospective profits to anyone, and I assume that he will adhere to that policy.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would the gentleman assent to an amendment that these profits shall not be permitted?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I do not think that this is necessarily guiding, but the following statement is made in a letter of the Secretary of War relating to this bill:

> If these expenditures were made at the instance of the commanding general of the camp and were in the interest of the soldiers at the camp, it would seem equitable to authorize the Secretary of War to pay such sums, not in excess of actual losses, as is necessary to reimburse the holders of these licenses or leases.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Actual losses. Does it mean losses in construction or losses of profit which they anticipated?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, losses of profits would be prospective losses. Actual losses, I take it, under any construction would only relate to money actually invested and lost.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Would not the gentleman from Illinois think it is safer, in view of the hands into which this is to go for construction, to have it written into the law that profits should not be allowed?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, in order to save time, I object.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not say it would not be, but under the letter of the Secretary of War——

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

AMENDMENT TO HOMESTEAD LAW, ALASKA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10806) to provide for the abolition of the 80-rod reserved shore spaces between claims on shore waters in Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, who is in charge of this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Alaska [Mr. GRIGSBY] is not here, but probably I can answer the question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask this question: This is a reservation which was made on the shores of the Alaska coast, which was in a way the culmination of many contests and years of efforts in this House and in the Government to preserve the right of navigation, and so forth, on the shores of Alaska and to prevent monopoly there. There was a long fight over it. I believe one Secretary of the Interior went out as the result, probably, of that fight. A good many reputations were possibly made or damaged; and when the bill passed the House gave certain rights, and this reservation was made to protect the water. Now, I do not pretend to be familiar with the present situation, but I wondered whether the Committee on the Public Lands, I think possibly all the members of which have come into the House since the original legislation, were familiar with the contests and the reasons for this.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think the theory of this bill is that no one gets an entry of this kind as a matter of right. The Secretary of Agriculture will not eliminate any land from the forest for entry under the first part of the bill if it is needed for shore or dock rights. Then, under the second part of the bill the Secretary of the Interior in a proper case will permit the entry, but the applicant does not procure the entry as a matter of right.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The original law—the gentleman has not answered the question, possibly may not have the information—was designed to protect the public by reserving certain spaces between places which were made by private individuals or by corporations or by individuals for the benefit of corporations, so no one could get a monopoly on some of these ports; at some places where navigation could be had, so no one would have the right to gain a monopoly of the shore line where vessels could come in. Now, I say I am not familiar with the present situation, but certainly the answer of the gentleman is hardly sufficient, because there was a reason for the enactment of the law. Now, if Congress made a mistake about it, and it may have made a mistake at the time, somebody ought to tell us so and why. I do not know, but it was the deliberate judgment at the time. This was not hastily enacted; it was not carelessly enacted; it was not enacted without knowledge of what they were doing.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no knowledge of the old law except what the gentleman from Illinois has given to me. We were informed by both departments that they could protect the situation. Here is the gentleman from Alaska now, and he perhaps can answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GRIGSBY. What is the question?

Mr. SINNOTT. The question was in reference to the original law, which the gentleman from Illinois says was designed to protect the shore rights, and he asked whether or not the matter is thrown open and unguarded by this bill?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Well, this bill is to extend the homestead laws of Alaska with reference to spaces of 80 rods along the shore line of all Alaska waters. That provision was inserted in the original act because it was thought that homesteaders might take up all the water suitable for harborage purposes. Now, there are on account of that reservation about 50,000 miles of good agricultural land which is unnecessarily reserved from entry.

This bill simply places it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior to waive that reservation wherever he sees fit. It does not absolutely throw the land open, but if the Secretary of the Interior deems that any particular entry will take up land that is wanted for harborage purposes he can refuse the patent. Otherwise he will grant it.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a short question? It reserves to the Secretary the right to protect the harbors?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Absolutely.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does this proposition include any mineral rights?

Mr. GRIGSBY. It does not affect any mineral rights in any way. All the land is open for mineral entry except in the forest reserves, anyway.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This 80-rod reserve does not affect their mineral rights at all?

Mr. GRIGSBY. It affects them in no way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Your bill does not affect minerals?

Mr. GRIGSBY. Not at all. It is to give the Secretary of the Interior the right to waive the 80-rod provision as to shore spaces.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat. L., p. 409), extending the homestead laws to Alaska, and the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat. L., p. 1028), amendatory thereof, creating 80-rod reserve spaces between entries and claims along the shores of navigable or other waters in the Territory of Alaska, are hereby repealed, and the shore spaces created by said acts are hereby restored to the public domain, but nothing herein shall prevent the President from withdrawing such shore lands as may be deemed necessary or advisable in the public interests.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the provisions of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat. L., p. 409), extending the homestead laws to Alaska, and of the act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stat. L., p. 1028), amendatory thereof, in so far as they reserve from sale and entry a space of at least 80 rods in width between tracts sold or entered under the provisions thereof along the shore of any navigable water, and provide that no entry shall be allowed extending more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water, shall not apply to lands classified and listed by the Secretary of Agriculture for entry under the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat., p. 233), and that the Secretary of the Interior may upon application to enter or otherwise in his discretion restore to entry and disposition such reserved spaces and may waive the restriction that no entry shall be allowed extending more than 160 rods along the shore of any navigable water as to such lands as he shall determine are not necessary for harborage uses and purposes."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REVENUES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to take from the Speaker's table the half-and-half bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for the conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, which the Clerk will report, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection I made awhile ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. MAPES, Mr. FOCHT, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN FLOOD-CONTROL WORKS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13313) to authorize the construction of flood-control and improvement works in Boise de Sioux River, the Red River of the North, and Lake Traverse, between the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know from the gentleman in charge of the bill something of the facts. As it is drawn it is in a very peculiar form. It provides that—

The drainage districts and other municipal authorities of the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, or anyone or more of them now or hereafter organized, etc., are hereby authorized to construct a dam.

Suppose there are a dozen such districts and authorities now organized; suppose four of them come to-day to the War Department and ask to do this work, and next week another combination of them come; suppose their plans are conflicting. Is it not a little indefinite to say that these districts or any of them may do a certain thing?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The situation is this: Some of those districts have not been formed, and it is difficult to determine definitely just how they will be formed. I can not see any great difficulty, because the Board of Engineers are the final judges as to what they approve, and these districts would have to comply with the requirements of the War Department in that respect. The engineers can only approve one plan.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman thinks it is all right, very well. Of course, if one or two of them, even under that option, rush in with a set of plans that the Secretary knows nothing about, and he approves them, and the other bunch is slower and get here late——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They would have to take their chances.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand the gentleman is familiar with the conditions, and if he thinks it will meet the case, I will not make any objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think there can be any difficulty at all. Those things can not be done in the dark. The organizations covering the territory affected are the only ones that could act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to make inquiry as to whether this bill is intended to correct a condition or is it merely operating on what may be a theory as to some flood-protection business?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There have been a great many plans made for the purpose of seeing if they could not find some way in which to relieve that country from the flood conditions that occur almost every spring.

No money is asked from the Federal Treasury. We are asking simply for power to go on and do the work. It happens to be an interstate stream, and in consequence we must have authority from the Federal Government to enable us to act.

Mr. GARD. The thing that impresses me is that there is no plan of flood protection. I would be glad to give my support to any plan of Federal acquiescence. I am happy to say that some of the States are willing to take care of their own business and not burden the Federal Government, and to that extent I appreciate what the gentleman is trying to do. But I note in the report that under a provision passed in the last river and harbor act the States were authorized to enter into an agreement to do the work, and the report states that the War Department has refused to give its approval on the ground that the legislation did not authorize the States to act through their drainage districts. What I wanted to ask was whether the river and harbor bill, which has again been sent to conference after some discussion, would carry a general provision which would allow these gentlemen to proceed?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No provision is contained in that bill at all. This provision is intended to remedy the defect in the old authorization. Now the trouble with the old authorization was that the States of Minnesota and North and South Dakota might do the work. The State of Minnesota under its constitution has no power to spend money for internal improvements of this kind. Consequently it was held by the Board of Engineers that the authorization to the State contained in the river and harbor appropriation act was not sufficiently broad so as to permit action through the drainage districts.

Mr. GARD. Is there any agreed-upon plan of flood protection up here at the outlet of Lake Traverse, in the Boise de Sioux River?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There has been a plan surveyed, and no doubt it will be put into effect as intended if this legislation goes through.

Mr. GARD. What is the use of getting legislation unless you know what is going through?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They adopted a plan that we tried to put into effect under the old provision.

Mr. GARD. The trouble about it, as I see it, is that you have no agreed-upon plan.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, there has been a plan agreed upon.

Mr. GARD. You said there was not, a moment ago. You said you had tried to get it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There have been a number of surveys. A plan was adopted and submitted by the governors of the three States to the Secretary of War for the purpose of having the work done, but when that was submitted objection was made by the Secretary on the ground that I have suggested, and hence we come now with this bill for the purpose of obtaining permission to do the work through drainage districts.

Mr. GARD. What I wanted to be advised of was whether these were drainage districts or municipal districts having adequate authority. I think it is a very vague phrase. It should be drainage districts.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In Minnesota the drainage districts will be formed. In South Dakota I am not sure that they have drainage districts, but they will operate through the counties. But they all have agreed, and this allows them to agree, to do the work. They have State legislation authorizing them to act under legislation of this kind. This bill has been presented to the War Department, and it has the approval of that department.

Mr. GARD. It may be said to have the War Department's approval, but the approval is not very pertinent to the issue. What I want particularly to know about is whether these drainage districts have agreed upon the plan to build a dam at the outlet of Lake Traverse in the Boise de Sioux River.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is the plan that has been agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is not this the situation, that the States have made a plan and submitted it to the War Department for approval?

Mr. GARD. That is what I am trying to learn, whether there has been a definite plan agreed upon by the States and submitted to the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There has been a definite plan agreed upon by the States and submitted to the Secretary of War, and the States were prepared to enter upon the work, but the War Department then said that authority was only given to the States directly to do the work, whereas the States had prepared to have the work done through drainage districts. This is simply to permit the States to do the work through drainage districts, the plan having been agreed upon, and the States being prepared to go ahead with the work.

Mr. GARD. Now, there is one element in this bill that is entirely at variance, as I take it, with what should be the provision. The bill comes from the Committee on Flood Control. It has for its purpose the control of flood waters up in that country. That is a laudable purpose. I would be glad to contribute as much as I can to have that purpose thoroughly accomplished.

I shall be glad to contribute as much as I can to have that purpose thoroughly accomplished, but I note on page 2 of the bill it provides also that they—may agree upon as necessary for the prevention and control of floods, the improvement of navigation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is some navigation.

Mr. GARD. Necessarily there must be an association between navigation and flood control under the language of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, the gentleman will remember that when the Flood Control Committee was created the House took away certain jurisdiction theretofore conferred on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. GARD. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And we passed a bill in reference to flood control on the Mississippi River, which is directly in the interest of navigation; and it has always been the policy of Congress, wherever there was any possibility of navigation, wherever authority was given for the construction of dams or otherwise, that the War Department should require the interests of navigation to be conserved.

Mr. GARD. The flood-control act which the gentleman speaks about did not carry for its purpose the improvement of navigation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That was one of the purposes.

Mr. GARD. That is always carried in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That was one of the purposes. That was the very reason why the Committee on Rivers and Harbors fought the creation of the Flood Control Committee.

Mr. GARD. It is but an incident of flood control. The primary purpose is the control of flood waters, which is very often entirely inconsistent with navigation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Never.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. When they start the prevention and control of floods, they ought also to consider the improvement of navigation, and we always require the War Department to do that.

Mr. GARD. Is this a navigable river?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The dam will be built at the lower end of Lake Traverse, which has some navigation.

Mr. GARD. What sort of navigation is there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They have grain elevators on the lake, and some boats haul grain and other commodities to and from the upper end of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There will be a great deal more navigation if they build a dam there than there will if they do not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It will undoubtedly increase navigation.

Mr. GARD. The previous bill carried the statement that there was no liability on the part of the United States. Is it intended that there shall be no financial liability upon the United States as a result of the passage of this bill?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. All the expense will be borne by the taxpayers in the immediate vicinity, who own land that will be benefited by the work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the drainage districts and other municipal authorities of the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, or any one or more of them now or hereafter organized and existing under the laws of said States, are hereby authorized to construct a dam at or near the outlet of Lake Traverse in the Boise de Sioux River, together with such dikes, spillways, diversion channels, and other works in said river and lake, and the Red River of the North, as such districts or municipal authorities, or any of them, may agree upon as necessary for the prevention and control of floods, the improvement of navigation, and the drainage of lands, and for that purpose may deepen and straighten any parts of said rivers: Provided, That plans for the work hereby authorized shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, and unless and until approved by them, no part of such work shall be built or commenced.

"SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

PATENTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9032) authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to accept and administer for the benefit of the public and the encouragement of industry inventions, patents, and patent rights, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, there is considerable controversy over this measure, and I think it will be just as well off the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. I ask unanimous consent that it be stricken from that calendar.

Mr. GARD. I object to the consideration of the bill. That will take it off.

Mr. NOLAN. That automatically takes it off the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

REIMBURSEMENT OF CERTAIN COUNTIES IN NEW MEXICO FROM GRANT-LAND FUNDS OF THE STATE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3867) authorizing the State of New Mexico to apply the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act, June 20, 1910, for the reimbursement of Grant County, Luna County, Hidalgo County, Santa Fe County, and the town of Silver City, N. Mex.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, this matter has been before considered on the calendar for unanimous consent, and I call the attention of those who may be proponents of the bill on the floor to-day to the statement contained in the letter of Secretary Lane of February 12, 1919, to the effect:

According to my understanding, however, Santa Fe County, notwithstanding the validation of the said bonds by Congress, did not at any time pay either the interest or principal and the bonds and accrued interest remained unpaid at the date of the admission of New Mexico into the Union. On the other hand, Grant County at all times paid the interest on its bonds as it became due and payable. This is likewise true of Luna County, which had been carved out of Grant County in 1901, and had assumed its proportionate share of the indebtedness evidenced by the bonds validated and confirmed by the act of 1897, supra, and at the date of admission of the State into the Union only the principal of the said bonds was outstanding, and there was no debt due by either of said counties at that date on account of accrued interest on these bonds.

So that unless we can have a report from the Secretary of the Interior as to the payment of this money which is now asked to be reimbursed I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman read from the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of February 12, 1919. Here is a letter in the report from the Secretary of the Interior of February 18, 1920, in which he says:

Should it be shown, however, to the satisfaction of your committee that Santa Fe County is entitled to be reimbursed for any moneys paid by it, I have no objection to offer to the enactment of this bill.

The Secretary, when he wrote the other letter, did not have the full information. I have a certified copy of the records of Santa Fe County showing that Santa Fe County paid $65,427.50.

Mr. GARD. I am glad to have that additional information. Still, the Secretary of the Interior says that "should it be shown to the satisfaction of your committee that Santa Fe County is entitled to be reimbursed, I have no objection to offer to the enactment of the bill." There has no affirmative evidence been shown to the department.

Mr. SINNOTT. I have the evidence here.

Mr. GARD. I say, unfortunately, that the statement the gentleman makes is not so conclusive as to carry with it the recommendation of the department. In other words, the paper that the gentleman calls a certificate has never been presented to the department for a proper report of the matter.

Mr. SINNOTT. It has been presented to the committee by the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. HERNANDEZ], who is always diligent and watchful for the interests of his State. He is absent on official business with the Indian Committee. Before he left he asked me to look after this bill. I have also personally conferred with Senator JONES of New Mexico, and he says the county paid this interest. I do not think we should be compelled to make a showing to the Secretary of the Interior in order to get back from him another report, inasmuch as he stated in his letter of February 18, 1920, that if it was shown to the satisfaction of the committee, and so forth, and it has been shown to the satisfaction of the committee that this county paid $65,427.50.

Mr. GARD. But the statement appearing on page 4 of the report is that it has not been shown that it was paid, or whether it has been paid, or enough of it to authorize this refund, the report does not show.

Mr. SINNOTT. The letter which the gentleman read from page 4 was dated February 12, 1919, and the letter I read is dated February 18, 1920.

Mr. GARD. My criticism is that it does not explain away the declaration of February 12, 1919.

Mr. SINNOTT. It shows absolutely that the interest has been paid.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. As a member of the subcommittee, we took full testimony on this, and we had a certified copy of the record showing that this county had paid this money.

Mr. GARD. How much did Santa Fe County pay?

Mr. SINNOTT. Sixty-five thousand four hundred and twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents. Here is a certificate of Alfredo Lucero, the clerk of the district court of the first judicial district of the State of New Mexico, and it is also certified to by the same person as the clerk of the county of Santa Fe.

Mr. GARD. What was the amount of the interest on the principal and the accrued interest on the bonds?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have it here. It reads:

Interest paid by Santa Fe County on railroad bonds per bond register.

On bonds of 1880 and coupons amounts to $36,470.

The total interest paid by Santa Fe County on the coupons is summarized: Bonds of 1880, $36,470; bonds of 1887, $7,920; bonds of 1891–92, $21,037.50; making a total of $65,427.50. Here are the certificates:

STATE OF NEW MEXICO,
County of Santa Fe, ss:

I, Alfredo Lucero, clerk of the county of Santa Fe and State of New Mexico, do hereby certify that the foregoing three pages contain a true, correct, and complete copy of the bond register of said county, showing the payment of coupons on interest-bearing bonds, and their respective numbers as the same were paid by the county treasurer of said county.

In witness hereof I have hereunto set my hand and official seal at my office in the city of Santa Fe, county of Santa Fe, and State of New Mexico, this 4th day of March, 1920.

[SEAL.] (Signed) ALFREDO LUCERO,
County Clerk of the County of Santa Fe, State of New Mexico.

STATE OF NEW MEXICO,
County of Santa Fe, ss:

I, Reed Holloman, judge of the first judicial district of the State of New Mexico and judge of the district court within and for the county of Santa Fe, do hereby certify that Alfredo Lucero, by whom the above attestation was made, was, at the time and date thereof, clerk of said court, duly qualified, and that the said attestation is in due form of law and made by the proper officer.

(Signed) REED HOLLOMAN,
Judge First Judicial District, State of New Mexico, etc.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen do not seem to make much progress in satisfying the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. I would prefer that the matter had been finally submitted to the department, so the Secretary could explain that which he said had not been done, if it has been done. I confess it is difficult for me to learn from the reading of the certificates whether or not this has been paid. If it has been, I do not care to stand in the way of the enactment of the bill even through this extraordinary process.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would be up to the State of New Mexico to determine whether the money had been paid or not. Does not the gentleman think it wholly unlikely that the State will pay money out of the treasury to the county of Santa Fe unless perfect proof is offered, which they have on record in the State and county?

Mr. GARD. I do not know, but I should say that Congress should have some proof before acting upon it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. All we do is to confer on the State the authority to pay the money which the State owes and which the county claims it is entitled to.

Mr. GARD. Necessarily we should have some proof to show that the county has actually paid it before we pass enabling legislation. If the gentleman is satisfied from the certificate that they did pay the amount of interest that they were chargeable with at the time and which the State desires to refund, I have no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am absolutely satisfied.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the authority and consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State of New Mexico to apply any part of the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act of June 20, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 557), for the reimbursement of Grant, Luna, and Hidalgo Counties for interest paid by said counties on the bonds of Grant County, and for the reimbursement of Santa Fe County for interest paid by said county on the bonds of Santa Fe County, which said bonds were validated, approved, and confirmed by act of Congress of January 16, 1897 (29 Stats., p. 487), and also for the payment of the principal of the bonds issued by the town of Silver City and likewise validated by said act of January 16, 1897, and to reimburse the town of Silver City for interest paid by said town on said bonds, all in addition to the obligations provided in said enabling act to be paid from the proceeds of said grant.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ABANDONED PORTIONS OF RAILROADS' RIGHTS OF WAY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9899) to provide for the disposition of abandoned portions of rights of way granted to railroad companies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill was considered before, and after an interrogation by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it was objected to by myself. Afterwards I had the privilege of talking with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON] about some amendments. Has the gentleman any amendments to propose to the bill?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes; the amendments that I propose to offer are minor amendments correcting the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. GARD. I have not the bill before me, and under the reservation of an objection I would like to have the gentleman advise me and the Members of the House what the proposed amendments are.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The amendments that I propose to offer are, in line 3, on page 2, to strike out the words "or its heirs"; in line 11, strike out the word "patent" and insert in lieu thereof the word "title"; and in line 15, to strike out the first word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the word "of."

Mr. GARD. The objection which was in my mind was that without any process by anybody, except the proof of the matter of abandonment, the title to this land vested in some subdivision which was outside a municipality, and simply because a man might own a piece of ground contiguous to this abandoned land, by virtue of the ownership and no other action he became entitled to this abandoned land. It seems to me there ought to be some approval by some one who has charge of the land rather than have the automatic addition to the man's own land.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. This does not do that automatically. The bill was originally drawn so that it would automatically do it, but by the suggestion of the department there was a committee amendment which has been submitted by the committee and which I will read—whether by forfeiture or by abandonment by said railroad company, declared or decreed by a court of competent jurisdiction or by act of Congress.

With that amendment the parties would either have to go into court and get a decree declaring the land forfeited in a competent court or by a special act of Congress. We should also bear in mind that this does not operate upon any railroad lands, excepting those that have been granted by the Government for railroad purposes alone, and the Supreme Court has said they have simply a base title, and when they abandon the lands for railroad purposes they had no further rights in them. You are not taking anything away from the railroads by passing this act, because they have no other rights in it.

Mr. GARD. I understand they have no further rights in it by abandonment, but that which I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman to is that before these abandoned strips vest in somebody else they should be submitted so some authority rather than to have them vest in a municipality because the strips happen to be there, or vest in a legal subdivision because it is immediately next thereto.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Here is a strip of road 100 or 200 feet wide, running through a quarter section of land. It would not be suggested that the Department of the Interior would grant title to a narrow strip to some one else, but it would naturally go to the party who has the original tract or subdivision, because to grant title to some one else or grant the Interior Department the right to pass upon whether it should go to the adjoining owner or to some one else, would leave it then where they might grant title to a narrow strip running through a quarter to another party.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Did not the acts of June 26, 1906, and February 25, 1909, make the same disposition of title that is proposed in this act?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Just exactly, and the only trouble with those two acts are, as stated by the Interior Department, that they were present in their operation and did not affect rights of way that have been abandoned or changed since the passage of those two acts. Now, this question in my State is that we have a line of road that has straightened its line since the 1909 act, and consequently those two acts do not operate upon these abandoned rights of way.

Mr. MONDELL. Many years ago I introduced a bill on this subject. I think it was probably the act of June 26, 1906. I think it was the first general act of this kind, and I am informed by the gentleman who introduced this bill that the same disposition was made of the title in that bill as in this case. It is the only disposition that can logically and properly be made of the title in such cases.

Mr. GARD. These are public lands originally given as a right of way, and by act of Congress or by decree of court they became abandoned. Whether they are great or small we do not know, but it would seem to me, therefore I am asking the gentleman, that with the abandonment, either by judicial decree or act of Congress, that the land would again revert to the United States and become public land, and there should be some provision made for their revesting in title or patent or whatever it is called in some one other than going to the man or municipality simply because they owned land immediately contiguous to the abandoned strip.

Mr. MONDELL. At the time the first act referred to in the report was passed the public domain in the West was covered with almost an innumerable number of these rights of way. Many men were occupying lands that were covered by one or two rights of way, without any knowledge on their part that there was any right-of-way cloud on their title. These congressional terminations of rights of way are necessary because, while the company having failed to comply with the conditions of the law has no longer any legal right, there is still a question as to the title where a patent was obtained after the land was clouded by a right of way.

Mr. GARD. This is not an abandonment by a congressional action. This provides what may be done in the event of congressional action or in the event of a judicial decree, and has for its purpose the absolute vesting of title to land in the municipality through which the strip runs or in the owner of some legal subdivision——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman intend to object to the bill? If he does not, I intend to object.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman desires to object, I think possibly he can save time.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I object.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Will the gentleman just withhold that for a moment. I am certain I can make it clear. In my State a quarter section——

Mr. BLANTON. Let me ask a question or two. The title of the railroad company was good only so long as the railroad company maintained operations, and immediately upon the cessation of operations reversion took place to the Government.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, what is the gentleman seeking to do with this land which reverts back to the Government?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. I want to give it to the man who owns a legal subdivision.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is a man who owns a legal subdivision entitled to something that he never purchased?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Because he would have received it in the first instance if the right of way had not been there.

Mr. BLANTON. And would have paid for it the same price as he paid for his other land?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Now, let me tell the gentleman this is the case I have in mind——

Mr. BLANTON. Just one point right there. The man is entitled to so many acres as a homestead?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If he does not get all of his acreage in one tract he can get the balance to which he is entitled out of another vacant tract, can he not?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. No. Here is a legal subdivision of 160 acres, and the railroad has gone through and taken out 100 feet of it running through——

Mr. BLANTON. Which amounts to 10 or 12 acres?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Not as much as that; only a few acres.

Mr. BLANTON. A few acres. If the man was entitled to 160 acres, was he not entitled to take up a part of his homestead——

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. No; he could only take a quarter of a section. Here is the point——

Mr. BLANTON. Why, does not the gentleman know the Land Office has granted patents in some cases to some three or four or five different tracts of land, each embracing the homestead of an individual?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. That may be true, but not in this case. Here is a narrow strip, and the Government would not get anything for it, or sell it to anybody, and you are reducing the value of that quarter section of land by returning title in the Government to a narrow strip.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose it has under it oil or coal or gas, or something else of value?

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. The land I have in mind is on the Milwaukee extension running to the coast. Later this company straightened the line and abandoned certain parts of the old line.

Mr. BLANTON. But your bill is a general bill, applicable to all public lands in the various States of the United States.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. It does not contain a single right except what is contained in two acts, one passed in 1906 and one in 1909, by Congress relating to this same subject.

Mr. BLANTON. And while there may not be oil, or gas, or coal, under the gentleman's particular land in which he is interested, the gentleman may know that down in Oklahoma, Louisiana, and other places sometimes 1 acre of land might be worth ten millions of dollars, with oil wells producing on it.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. Wait a minute. If I am not mistaken—I can not say positively—I think in all of the lands granted here there have been reserved the minerals. I believe they have in the lands granted to the State of South Dakota. I have no objection to an amendment if the gentleman desires that they shall be reserved.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think this kind of a bill should be taken up and passed on Decoration Day at three minutes past 6 o'clock, with only a few of us here who have been here since 12 o'clock.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON. This is a bill that ought to be passed.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman from Texas yield a minute?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. GANDY. In the case of a homestead upon which there is a railroad right of way, the homesteader pays just exactly the same fee to the land office, whether there is or is not a railroad right of way.

Mr. BLANTON. Take it down in Louisiana or Oklahoma——

Mr. GANDY. Let me finish the statement. In the land involved, or in any other place in South Dakota, where the right of way might be abandoned, the homesteader in compliance with the law has already performed the requisite and necessary improvement and necessary cultivation to the necessary acreage of land to which he was entitled. He was entitled to it then and is entitled to it now.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to something he may have overlooked. Down on the Red River now the Government of the United States has a controversy where just one-half of the river bed alone is worth millions of dollars. And there are certain parts of the country, which I could cite the gentleman to, where the right of way of railroads is worth millions of dollars by reason of oil and coal and gas found underneath the ground.

Mr. GANDY. Let me say to the gentleman there would be no objection——

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, is it the intention of the gentleman from Wyoming to adjourn?

Mr. MONDELL. I have been informed by one or two gentlemen that they propose making a point of no quorum about this time. While I should be very glad to go on, I realize we can not do so without a quorum.

Mr. GARD. I make the point of order——

Mr. MONDELL. I know that some Members would not wish to come in this evening in answer to a roll call, and therefore I think we better adjourn before a point of no quorum is made. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MEMORIAL DAY.

Mr. MONDELL. This is the day, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARD. I have pending a point of order that there is no quorum present, but I reserve it. I withdraw the point.

Mr. MONDELL. I propose making a motion to adjourn very soon.

Mr. Speaker, this is the day set aside by custom and law in memory and honor of the Nation's heroic dead. Throughout the length and breadth of the land patriotic citizens are strewing flowers on the graves and doing honor to the memory of those who have worn the Nation's uniform and upheld and defended the Nation's flag. In order to dispose of the public business, it has been necessary for the Congress to remain in session to-day. But during this time, while we have been giving attention to the people's business, our hearts have been with the patriotic citizens throughout the country who are honoring the memory and decorating the graves of the Nation's defenders. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn in honor of Memorial Day and in honor of the heroic men and women in whose memory the day was established and is celebrated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] withhold that just a moment?

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to make the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. I will move to adjourn in just a moment. I want to say to the gentlemen present that from this time on it will be necessary to remain in session rather late in the evening, if we are to conclude the business and get away from here this week. I think gentlemen should so arrange their affairs as to be able to be here until quite a late hour to-morrow night and the following nights of the week until Saturday. After to-morrow I shall ask unanimous consent that when we meet we meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think it would be better practice to take a recess from 6 o'clock in the evening until 8, so that Members can go and get something to eat?

Mr. MONDELL. I think that would be best. If we can secure an agreement to that effect, I will be very glad to make that arrangement.

Mr. DYER. Do it now.

Mr. BLANTON. We could hold continuously on if the gentleman from Wyoming would furnish us with a little grape juice and sandwiches and things of that kind.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 400. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims;

H. R. 3184. An act to create a Federal power commission, to provide for the improvement of navigation, the development of water power, the use of the public lands in relation thereto, and to repeal section 18 of the river and harbor appropriation act approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12272. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921; and

H. R. 12775. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and to establish military justice.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 1, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. DENISON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 4167) to extend the time for the completion of the municipal bridge approaches, and extensions and additions thereto, by the city of St. Louis, within the States of Illinois and Missouri, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1068), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOOD, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14335) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1069), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RODENBERG, from the Committee on Flood Control, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14311) to authorize the improvement of Red Lake and Red Lake River, in the State of Minnesota, for navigation, drainage, and flood-control purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1070), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14286) to authorize officers of the naval service to accept offices with compensation and emoluments from governments of the Republic of South America, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1071), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HICKS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14123) to create a Bureau of Aeronautics in the Department of the Navy, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1073), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GOOD: A bill (H. R. 14335) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

By Mr. McKEOWN: A bill (H. R. 14336) to amend an act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. BRITTEN: A bill (H. R. 14337) authorizing the disposition of certain lands title to which was acquired by the United States for naval purposes during the war, which lands are no longer needed for naval purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. MOON (by direction of the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries): A bill (H. R. 14338) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the compensation of United States postal employees; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. AYRES: A bill (H. R. 14339) granting an increase of pension to Roxie L. Colbert; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLAND of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 14340) granting an increase of pension to William Homer Edwards; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 14341) granting an increase of pension to Mervin A. Coshun; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNALLY: A bill (H. R. 14342) for the relief of Mrs. John P. Hopkins; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DUNBAR: A bill (H. R. 14343) granting a pension to Indiana Abbott; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 14344) granting a pension to Jacob Sigler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 1, 1920.

(Legislative day of Monday, May 24, 1920.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to an article which appeared in yesterday's New York World. I bring it to the attention of the Senate, and more particularly to the members of the Committee on Appropriations who are present, that they may know the conditions prevailing in the city of New York, and I am told that they are prevailing generally throughout the large centers of population. This article indicates that dishonest men are trading in forged certificates to permit the taking from bond of whisky, and have cleaned up more than $10,000,000 in the last two months.

We have in New York City, as in the other large cities in the country, an official the title of whose office is director of prohibition. Applications are made to this official to withdraw liquor from bond or from a distillery. Applications are forwarded to the department here at Washington, and they are invariably approved. They are then returned to the place of application. Usually the permit is granted, although it is the practice in New York to hold up the permits for a considerable period for one reason or another, and some applicants insist that they are required to pay an illegal fee.

The article to which I have referred states that 11,000 permits have been issued in two months in New York City for the withdrawal of whisky from bonded warehouses or from distilleries, and of that number over 1,200 were forged. The article also indicates that the matter was called to the attention of the director, Mr. O'Connor, in New York, and that he was quite surprised, although it has been a matter of common knowledge for the past two months that forged permits were being issued. There has even been an intimation in some quarters that these fake permits were issued with the knowledge of people from the inside.

I have never in all my experience in the city of New York had my attention called to anything that was so indicative of corruption on the part of public officials. I wish to suggest to the members of the Appropriations Committee now present that when requests come to them again for the granting of appropriations for the enforcement of the prohibition law in the larger cities of the country, they ought to scrutinize them with very great care.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and the Senate granted $2,500,000 more for the enforcement of the prohibition law than the House allowed. That will appear in the sundry civil appropriation bill, upon which the conferees agreed last night.

I will say to the Senator that that amount is what was asked for by the internal-revenue office, and also the amount required for the enforcement of the prohibition law affecting importations and exportations of liquor to and from the United States. It is not because Congress has not given the money asked for. The trouble comes from some other source. There is not a member of the Committee on Appropriations who does not feel that we want to appropriate every dollar necessary to enforce that law and enforce it rigidly.

The director of prohibition in the State of New York may be doing the same as the director of prohibition in the State of Utah in spending much of his time in politics. Only this morning I received a copy of a local paper from Utah in which there is an article telling just where the director of prohibition is going to reorganize the Democratic precinct committees and county committees and just where he would be upon certain days in visiting counties south of Salt Lake City. If that kind of work is being done in New York, it is no wonder that conditions exist as portrayed in the article in the New York World. I sincerely hope that it is not true. I do not understand that these directors of prohibition were appointed for political purposes. I understood that they were appointed to enforce the law and see that it was not violated, but evidently in some parts of the country that is not the fact.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I make no charge that the director of prohibition in the city of New York is interfering with politics.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not charge that he is.

Mr. CALDER. But if this article is true, then we have an enforcement of the prohibition law in New York which is being taken advantage of to the personal profit of a group of men who ought to be in jail. The charge is made here that during the past two months $10,000,000 have been cleaned up by a group of men who have been handling so-called forged permits.

In New York City to-day, and I am informed it is the practice throughout the country in the larger cities, many of the liquor saloons have not given up their places of business since the constitutional amendment went into effect, and are openly selling liquor. Of course, that comes from the fact that the people are out of sympathy with the enforcement of the law. Not only that, but the charge is frequently made that they are doing this because they are paying for the privilege. That is what I object to. I seriously object to anyone violating the law, but I more seriously object to the fact that men can, without any effort to stop them, make fortunes in this way. That is the charge that comes to me.

I am not mentioning names, and I would not think of doing so without having the consent of my informants. The charges come to me that men in the employ of the United States Government are the ones who have profited by this practice. The statement appears in the article to which I have referred that it will take $20,000,000 to enforce the prohibition law in the city of New York alone. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the law is not now being enforced in any degree, and that no attempt is being made to enforce it, and permits are being granted without number that are simple forgeries. Evidently some one has put a printing press to work, and if one wants a permit and can not get it legitimately he can by some inside method secure it. That is what I wish to call to the attention of the Appropriations Committee, in order that when the prohibition enforcement department comes before that committee and asks for more money to enforce the prohibition law, the committee may know that no attempt is being made to enforce it, at least in New York City.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the officials of the Government of the United States are doing these unlawful things, the Appropriations Committee could give them an unlimited amount of money and it would not help the matter at all. I think there ought to be an investigation made of the charge in the New York World, and if there is any basis for it, it certainly will develop and the guilty parties can be found.

Mr. President, there is at this time more counterfeiting of not only money but of stamps than ever was known in the history of the United States. When Mr. Moran, of the Secret Service, called the attention of the Senate committee to the fact that it was necessary to have an additional appropriation, more than they had ever had before, to stop counterfeiting, the Committee on Appropriations granted every cent asked for.

I wish to say in conclusion that if there is the least foundation for the charge that is made in the New York World, to which the Senator from New York calls attention, there ought to be a full investigation; and it seems to me the Department of Justice, if its attention was called to it, should make an investigation on its own part to find out whether there is any truth in the charge thus made.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that last night I addressed a communication to the Department of Justice and called attention to the facts outlined in the article. What I am objecting to and what every decent, law-abiding citizen objects to is the statement spread broadcast throughout New York City that this is an inside job, that somebody is profiting by encouraging the sale and purchase of these forged permits and permitting the sale of liquor through them.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the difficulty underlying the subject to which the Senator from New York has referred is obvious. The factor which permits these New Yorkers to garner millions of dollars in the course of a few days in the dispensation of liquor is the appetite for alcohol which has not been sensibly affected by the eighteenth amendment. The Senator, if he would remove the evil, should amend the eighteenth amendment not only to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks, but to quench the appetites of men. Or the Senator might introduce another and distinct amendment to that end; indeed, he might well join forces with Mr. Bryan and draft a proposition for a constitutional amendment establishing a single standard of morals and abolishing all thirst for intoxicants. If by the Constitution we can impose standards of morality, we can also extinguish the appetite for stimulants, and if so, we will not be troubled in future with makers of fortunes overnight. Unless we do this, those who recognize the national appetite as an asset will both encourage and satisfy it.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3867) authorizing the State of New Mexico to apply the proceeds of the grant to said State of 1,000,000 acres of land made by section 7 of the enabling act, June 20, 1910, for the reimbursement of Grant County, Luna County, Hidalgo County, Santa Fe County, and the town of Silver City, N. Mex.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MAPES, Mr. FOCHT, and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10806. An act to provide for the abolition of the 80-rod reserved shore spaces between claims on shore waters in Alaska;

H. R. 13313. An act to authorize the construction of flood-control and improvement works in Boise de Sioux River, the Red River of the North, and Lake Traverse, between the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota;

H. R. 13931. An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products; and

H. J. Res. 370. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to a concurrent resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 5th day of June, 1920, at 4 o'clock post meridian, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 10806. An act to provide for the abolition of the 80-rod reserved shore spaces between claims on shore waters in Alaska was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories.

H. R. 13313. An act to authorize the construction of flood-control and improvement works in Boise de Sioux River, the Red River of the North, and Lake Traverse, between the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 13931. An act to authorize association of producers of agricultural products was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED SOLDIERS' BONUS.

Mr. THOMAS. But, Mr. President, I rose this morning to refute the reflections of a letter, of date the 24th of May, from Los Angeles, which I received yesterday, which informs me that I "and the rest of the Democratic Party will oppose anything toward giving a bonus for the soldiers who served in the World War." My correspondent says:

DEAR SIR: In looking over the Los Angeles Herald this evening I noticed where you and the rest of the Democrats there would oppose anything toward giving a bonus for all soldiers that served in the World War.

I don't wish you or any of your Democrat politicians any harm, but I do wish from the bottom of my heart that if we ever have another war that they stick you and anyone else that is opposing any such measure right up in the front line.

Mr. President, here is a distinct charge that the Democratic Party is opposed to the bonus. I can not permit that slander to remain unrebuked. I know of no more unfounded reproach which can be leveled at my party.

Early last week I had a little ground to hope that within its ranks there was some sincere and serious intention to oppose this last raid upon the Treasury. Indeed, I had personal assurances to that effect which encouraged me, pessimist as I am, to believe some of the old ideas regarding the administration of our fiscal affairs still prevailed in the mind of the average Democratic legislator.

But when the House set aside its rules by a bare majority, and then introduced and demanded a roll call upon its so-called bonus proposition, the widely advertised and ostentatious virtue of more than two-thirds of its Members withered away like violets in a July sun. When the final result was announced, the remnant of the opposition was too small to be significant of anything more than that the roll call is the supreme test of moral fortitude. Yet in the face of that record this gentleman has the audacity to assert that the Democratic Party is opposed to the bonus! It is not true. I resent the imputation and deny the charge with all the fervor that I can command.

Why, Mr. President, I know of nothing more appropriate at this hour of patriotic expression than the presentation of the bonus bill to the Senate of the United States from the House of Representatives on Decoration Day. That is a day devoted to our sacred dead, to tributes and eulogies, to the recurrence to the traditions and achievements which make America so illustrious, and which inspire her people with courage for the future. It is a serious and somber time. It is therefore a stimulation that while we seek to derive inspiration from the records of the dead we should also make due provision for the demands of the living. It beguiles the grief of the Nation while laying flowers and laurel wreaths upon the graves of the dead to highly resolve at the same time to replenish the pockets of the living; thus grief and joy, despair and hope, mingle our devotions with our proposed legislation. "Tears for the dead" and greenbacks for the living. This, Mr. President, is a platform which should appeal to the patriotism and the cupidity, to the hopes and ambitions of all classes and conditions of politicians—Democratic, Republican, Socialist, and Progressive—in this good year 1920.

Here let me descant for a moment upon the pleasing contrast between legislative investigations of campaign funds and their expenditure on the one hand and proposed legislative appropriations for votes upon the other. A Senate committee is now probing into the financial records and capabilities of certain prominent candidates, both Democratic and Republican, for the Presidency. It seems that some of them have enjoyed a campaign fund raised by their friends in excess of a million dollars; that others, out of their own pockets, have expended large amounts; and that all have been collecting and distributing money for campaign purposes in promoting their claims under the primary laws of different States. This exposé, Mr. President, seems to have shocked the conscience both of the people and the Senate. The idea that a man aspiring to the high position of President of the United States should have behind him a fund of a million dollars for the corruption of the electorate is appalling to some of us. What are we coming to? The representatives of the Democratic Party are keeping record of these Republican expenditures as they are disclosed by the committee from day to day. Our Republican friends are eager for similar conditions to be revealed regarding Democratic candidates, that both may go before the people and virtuously condemn the corruptive practices of the candidate, so unmindful of the welfare of the country and so thoroughly controlled by his own ambitions as to debauch the electorate to gratify his unholy ambitions.

On the other hand, Congress proposes to give the people an object lesson in political expenditure which, if successful, will certainly take away their breath as well as their money by the levy of a special tax, amounting to some $2,000,000,000, for the benefit of and to attract the political support of 2,000,000 ex-service men. Since each party seeks to outdo the other in generosity, it is to be hoped that this support may be equally divided between them. Indeed, the service men will do this if they are wise, for that will keep both parties alive and on the job when future bonuses are to be demanded. Note the contrast. Upon the one hand is our disapproval of the expenditure of a few million dollars for the promotion of candidacies, and upon the other our own proposed lavish appropriation of an amount, variously estimated at from $1,500,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 for the promotion of our party ambitions. The hypocrisy, the clumsy exhibitions of disapprobation of the practices of the candidates when compared with our own contemplated conduct, needs no further comment from me. If it is wrong for candidates to expend money to secure a nomination, can it be right to expend money to elect him after nomination?

I do not believe in the expenditure of money for any other than legitimate purposes in elections. I have always denounced and shall so long as I live continue to denounce the use of money for the corruption of the electorate; but those who propose to appropriate these huge sums from the Treasury of the United States at the expense of the taxpayers for the indirect accomplishment of the same purpose can not with any decency or consistency direct public attention to the mote in the eyes of the candidate and overlook the larger beam in their own.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 29, 1920:

S. 3897. An act to amend section 16 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916 known as the Federal farm-loan act.

On May 31, 1920:

S. 4163. An act to incorporate the Roosevelt Memorial Association.

CONFIRMATION OF WILLIAM L. FRIERSON.

Mr. SHIELDS. Out of order, I desire, as in open executive session, to make a report from the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to a matter which is of the utmost importance, to be acted upon before recess is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the report being received in open executive session? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on the Judiciary reports in favor of the confirmation of William L. Frierson, of Chattanooga, Tenn., now Assistant Attorney General, to be Solicitor General, vice Alexander C. King, appointed circuit judge.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the confirmation in open executive session? The Chair hears none. Mr. Frierson is confirmed, and the President of the United States will be notified thereof.

ARMENIAN MANDATORY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me, since he is about to discuss the question of the mandate, to bring the resolution in regard to the mandate formally before the Senate? I think it was set aside by unanimous consent, and I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 27, respectfully declining to grant to the Executive the power to accept a mandate over Armenia, as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to submit one or two observations upon the pending Armenian resolution. I shall vote for the resolution and shall vote against all amendments or substitutes offered thus far. I am conscious of the need for some strong, thoroughly systematized control of the countries in Asia Minor which for centuries have been under the domination of the Turk. I am as fully sensible as any man can be of the deplorable conditions confronting the world from that quarter. No man has a greater horror than I of the awful and unheard of disasters and cruelties that have been visited upon these unhappy peoples, and I am free to admit that if the United States should assume a mandate over any section of the world none would appeal to me so eloquently as Armenia. Indeed, I may go further and declare myself ready and anxious to support any measure short of control through and by means of which we can intelligently work out some system of benefit to the Armenian people. Nothing of the kind, however, has thus far been outlined.

What is geographical Armenia? I have read the Harbord report and the subsidiary report of Gen. Moseley, both of which have been printed as Senate documents. But I am unable to determine what Armenia is. Of course, it has boundaries, imaginary at least, but just where the Armenian people as a nation begin and just where they end, what their geographical limitations are, I am unable to determine. There be Russian Armenians; there be Turkish Armenians; and there be thousands and thousands of Armenians scattered over Asia Minor and perhaps half a million in Rumelia, which includes Constantinople.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I presume the Senator in stating that he is unable to determine the limits of Armenia refers to the present Armenia. My reading is that the historic Armenia, the Armenia which existed centuries ago, was very clearly delimited.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I am speaking of the Armenia for which this mandate is requested. Of course, the ancient Armenia had its geographical delimitations, and they included territory subordinate to the Turk and territory subordinate to the Russians.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If I understand the present situation, the President has already accepted the commission to define, so far as Turkey is concerned, the limitations of what will be the Armenia over which the mandate is to be exercised.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President; that is very true, and I am afraid that before he shall have accomplished that task satisfactorily he will regret that he ever assumed its responsibilities.

Because the political entity which we know as Armenia is indefinable; because the people of Armenia consist of as many Mohammedans as Christians, and of five or six racial divisions of people; because Armenia, bounded upon the north somewhere by Georgia and by Azarbaijan, is in controversy with these countries, and has been intermittently for centuries; because she is practically surrounded by hostile peoples differing in religion and largely in race from themselves; because hundreds of thousands of Armenians must still remain for years in these adjacent countries and other parts of Turkey, where they live and were born; because the carving out of a republic of Armenia will inevitably provoke racial and geographical controversies of tremendous proportions; because Armenia is economically dependent upon the railway systems formerly controlled by Russia, but now under the divided dominion of Azarbaijan, of Georgia, and herself; because any mandatory in Armenia must necessarily be dependent upon the continued freedom of passage through the Dardanelles; and because of the complicated military problem to which Gen. Moseley's report is devoted, Gen. Harbord suggests—indeed, he recommends—that if a mandate be taken at all it can be successful only if it includes all of Turkey, certainly Constantinople, Anatolia, and the Transcaucasus country, a section larger than Alaska in geographical dimensions.

Mr. President, I shall not weary the Senate by reading at length from these reports, but I may say parenthetically that unless we accept the conclusions of these reports without cogent reasons for their rejection we never should have sent the mission there. Its membership was selected with great care; its duties were clearly defined; it was headed by one of our ablest and most brilliant soldiers and was composed of a staff thoroughly competent to deal with the political, the industrial, the military, the ethnographic, and the geographic features of the problem.

Gen. Harbord, in his report, after setting out at considerable but not unnecessary length the conditions which he discovered there, says, on page 15:

> A power which should undertake a mandatory for Armenia and Transcaucasia without control of the contiguous territory of Asia Minor—Anatolia—and of Constantinople, with its hinterland of Roumelia, would undertake it under most unfavorable and trying conditions, so difficult as to make the cost almost prohibitive, the maintenance of law and order and the security of life and property uncertain, and ultimate success extremely doubtful.

On page 19 he asks two questions which are pregnant with possibilities—indeed, with probabilities:

> What is to be done with Turkey?
> What is Russia going to do?

Why, Mr. President, that directly confronts the Nation with two contingencies, each of which in the very nature of things must eventuate in difficulty; and the general says, in immediate reply to his questions:

> Pending the ultimate settlement of these questions the mission believes that, for reasons set forth, the power which takes a mandate from Armenia should also exercise a mandate for Anatolia, Roumelia, Constantinople, and Transcaucasia; the boundaries of the Turkish vilayets of Armenia and Anatolia and the interior boundaries of Russian Armenia, Georgia, and Azarbaijan to remain substantially as they are for the present. The divisions of such mandate are an administrative detail to be worked out by the mandatory power. Good administration indicates that there should be some intermediate authority between the provinces and the capital—

And so forth.

There is a movement in Turkey known generally as the Turkish national movement, at the head of which is Moustapha Kemal Pasha. It was born of, and is stimulated by, that national feeling which the Turk possesses in common with the other races of the world. It is an open protest against the partial partition of Turkey between the Allies, and a determination to resist to the death, if need be, not only those segregations of territory which have been made, but those also which are threatened. Since this report, the Marash massacre has been reported, and frequent conflicts occur between the French and the representatives of this national movement in Syria.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In relation to the statement in the report of the Harbord Mission that any mandate for Armenia should include Turkey and Roumelia and Transcaucasia and one or two other countries, let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, as I understand, the Turkish treaty, which has recently been submitted to the Turks or is about to be submitted to the Turks, puts Constantinople and the Dardanelles and some other Turkish territory under the control of Great Britain, which, I should think, breaks up the scheme of the Harbord Mission that Turkey should be in the Armenian mandate.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I was about to come to that. I have referred to the attitude of Turkey and the national movement, said in this report to be an extremely formidable one. Indeed, we can understand it ourselves. If any attempt were made to ravish the United States of a part of its territory, although we were a defeated nation, one can easily understand how the national spirit would react to it.

Constantinople and Roumelia, which is the hinterland, have been in possession of the Allies virtually since the day of the Turkish surrender; and under the treaty, as stated by the Senator, it is to be permanently turned over to the greatest of the Allies, which will use it, and very properly so, for the welfare of the world in general and for that of Great Britain in particular. The Bolshevist has made his appearance upon the shores of the Caspian. He has captured Batum, he has penetrated Persia, he is already within the known geographical boundaries of Armenia, and it is fair to assume that he will hold what he has taken until dispossessed by force.

Now, if it be true—and I do not think there can be any question about it—that a mandatory for Armenia alone is predoomed and predestined to miserable failure, which would seriously jeopardize American prestige, and if it be true—as this report emphasizes the fact to be—that to make the mandate effectual we must practically possess ourselves of all of Turkey, and if in addition thereto we shall follow the recommendation of Gen. Moseley and under the mandatory expel the Turk entirely from Europe, it would not tax the reflective faculties of a 10-year-old schoolboy to forecast the result of our mandate. We will be injected into one of the bitterest, most implacable, and chronic controversies that ever afflicted the world, and with every probability that all the nations of the earth will be actively or passively opposed to our policy, whatever that may be. We will bring upon our heads the denunciation, and justly so, of the inhabitants of these afflicted parts of the world, because of their disappointments consequent upon our inability to meet all their requirements; the undying hatred of the Turkish people; a direct conflict with the new Russian government, whatever its ultimate character; we will be in constant wrangle with the Kurds, the inhabitants of Azarbaijan, the Georgians; and especially, Mr. President, if, having such a mandate we fail to operate it in accord with the unchanging tendencies, the ambitions, and policies of these people, a task impossible of accomplishment since these can not be mutually reconciled.

I have purposely refrained thus far from referring to the religious aspects of the situation. Here is the meeting place, perhaps I should better say the mingling place, of the Christian and of the Mohammedan, two religions which have contested for centuries for world supremacy, two religions comprising hundreds of millions of adherents, with Mohammedans numerically predominating, whose advocates and conflicts are a past and present testimony to the implacability of religious intolerance, two diverging theological systems filled with opposing policies and convictions relating to theological conditions of the present and of the future, of time and of immortality, two militant schools of religious thought and conception which can coexist only under the dominance of a supreme power equally tolerant of both.

Ours is a land of religious freedom, where one can worship God or refuse to worship Him, as he sees fit, and be none the worse for it, but such an attitude can be safely assumed by no man in Asia Minor. The Turk will demand protection and the right to propagate his religion under our mandate. The Armenian, pointing to the long line of atrocities and murders which have stained and disfigured his career under Turkish rule, will very properly insist upon a curtailment of Mohammedan rights and privileges.

Mr. President, no statesmanship ever existed which can grapple with and successfully solve this problem. It is a problem of the ages. The outstanding fact in the history of man is that religious fanaticism always controls it. It is sometimes dormant, sometimes seems to have entirely subsided; it smoulders through years, but it reappears upon occasion at all times and with all generations. It is fanatical, it is implacable, it is cruel beyond imagination; it finds expression in those awful conflicts which have deluged nations in blood and many times reversed the hand upon the dial of history.

I contend, Mr. President, that under these circumstances it would be little short of madness for the United States to enter upon this new and untried mission, fraught with so many terrible contingencies and bound to encourage demands for mandates elsewhere.

Now, just a word as to the probable expense of this mandatory. Gen. Harbord figures it, for five years, at approximately $750,000,000. He thinks that as conditions improve the revenues of the subject peoples will also improve, and therefore he states his estimate in diminishing quantities from year to year. But Gen. Moseley estimates that to begin with we should require an Army of 69,450, exclusive of officers. These, with the addition of about 2,000 officers, would make in round numbers a force of 72,000, 5,000 miles away from home.

Gen. Moseley estimates the annual military cost of the Army alone, for Turkey in Europe, Anatolia, and for the Transcaucasus, at $104,175,000. This does not take into consideration the expense of civil administration, which in all probability would equal the sum of the military expenditure, and thus become an additional burden upon the Treasury. We might secure a refund of it, and we might not. The chances are all against it.

Both these distinguished soldiers, Mr. President, warn us of the time which must be consumed in a successful administration of the mandate, once it is undertaken. The renovation of Asia Minor, industrially, socially, politically, and upon lines of sanitation, is a task for generations of men. These peoples must be made over, so to speak. Their old-time animosities, their centuries-old customs and conditions, their racial hatred, their religious divisions, culminating so frequently in murder, massacre, and the wholesale destruction of property, their methods of living, their education—all these things are the work of time, and if the Government of the United States should be authorized to accept this mandate, in my judgment it would remain permanently in Asia Minor, unable to end its supervision of that country, unwilling to abandon them once their embryo civilization has been constructed upon American lines, and reluctant to expose them to the ever-existing ambitions and conflicting interests of the great powers of the world.

Mr. President, this is an object lesson of what America may expect once she enters upon a league of nations. This proposed first fruit of the abandonment of our traditional policy and our identification with the affairs of distant peoples of another hemisphere with whom we have nothing in common, for the imposition upon them, through the agency of a military establishment, of American principles and American institutions, fraught, as it is and must be, with controversy, with conflict, and with vast and unlimited expenditure, bound to bring upon our devoted heads the denunciation and resentment of every people dissatisfied with our administration, justifies, as nothing else could justify, the attitude and convictions of those who, under their oaths of office, have been unable to accept this treaty.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am unable to regard the request of the President with favor, and shall cast my vote in favor of the resolution which has been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] relative to the pending concurrent resolution denying authority for this Government to exercise a mandate over Armenia, delivered yesterday, and the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], just concluded, very forcibly and clearly set forth the difficulties associated with this problem.

No student of the subject can be unmindful of the many complicated questions involved in the exercise of a mandate for Armenia, whether that responsibility be assumed by the United States or by some other Government.

Mr. President, sentiment in the Senate indicates that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations will be agreed to, probably without amendment. Believing that such action will be disastrous to the interests of a great, a brave, and a suffering people, who are entitled to consideration and some protection at the hands of the allied powers, who are dictating the affairs of the Near East and who are in a position to afford that deserved and necessary protection without serious menace to themselves, I ask the Senate to reject this resolution or so modify it that the United States may be permitted, either by itself, at the request and with the support of the Allies, or in conjunction with them, to give support and assistance to Armenia and the Armenians.

It is both natural and commendable that Senators, in the presence of responsibilities imposed by such an issue as the one now confronting the Senate, should proceed with caution. It is also obligatory that our conduct should be marked by a comprehensive grasp of national responsibility. This subject, like many other important issues coming before the Congress, is clouded with complications numerous and confusing, which complications tend to obscure the primary proposition and render difficult that harmony of action here so valuable in its moral influence on other Governments and peoples.

The cordial sympathy which the American people have long felt and frequently manifested for Armenia and her oppressed peoples was greatly intensified by the sacrifices and suffering of the Armenians and their loyalty to the cause of the Allies. For years generous citizens of the United States have contributed enormous sums to charitable funds designed to relieve the condition of the Armenians brought about by age-long oppression. It is the consensus of opinion of those who have investigated conditions in Armenia that such relief is only temporary in character and is in no sense adequate to the demands of the situation.

The sympathy of the people of the United States for Armenia found a recent expression in the resolution of the Senate moved by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] and agreed to without a dissenting vote a little less than two weeks ago. That resolution recites the massacres and atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered and the deplorable condition of insecurity, starvation, and misery now prevalent among them. It expresses the congratulations of the Senate on the achievement of Armenian independence, and the hope that a stable government may be established capable of protecting individual liberties and rights and of realizing nationalistic aspirations.

The only action suggested in that resolution is a request to the President to dispatch a United States warship and a force of marines to the port of Batum for the protection of American lives and property.

That Senate resolution admittedly has no force. It constitutes a mere expression of sympathy and opinion by the Senate, a request from a branch of the legislative department to the Executive, and is, of course, lacking in legislative authority. The Senate has no jurisdiction over the subject matter of the resolution, that being within the powers and prerogatives of the Executive under the Federal Constitution.

When the President received the resolution just referred to he responded in a message informing the Congress that the various nations with whom this Government was associated in the conduct of the war—in fact, all of the Governments represented in the peace conference—have decided that Armenia has reached the stage of development justifying the recognition of her independence, subject to administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory, and that the United States has been requested to assume that responsibility. The President believes that an invitation so unanimously extended should be accepted and that our Government should perform the functions of a mandate for Armenia in substantial compliance with the provisions of the peace treaty.

The advice to the Executive in the resolution of the Senator from Ohio is a voluntary act on the part of the Senate, and without constitutional authority, while the recommendation of the President that Congress authorize the mandate is clearly within the constitutional functions of the Executive.

The pending concurrent resolution declining to grant the President the power to accept a mandate over Armenia is the response of Congress proposed by the majority of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations.

While I again admit that the subject is associated with great difficulties, in my opinion acceptance of a proper mandate, even though it is attended with such difficulties, is preferable to armed occupation, such as is suggested and advised by the Senate resolution heretofore adopted.

Among the difficulties clearly set forth in the report of the American military commission relating to the exercise of a mandate over Armenia may be mentioned the scattered condition of the Armenian people, the want of definite geographical boundaries for Armenia, the existence of many hostile contiguous countries threatening the use of armed forces, the interruption of the means of communication, the remoteness of Armenia from this country, and her exposure to European quarrels. All these circumstances, as well as the expense to be incurred, justify us in seeking a better method of affording relief for Armenia, if it can be found.

If the United States proceeds in the matter at all, her action should be calculated to afford adequate relief, for this alone will justify the assumption of any responsibility. Anything less will disappoint the hopes of the Armenians and will further disgust our recent allies, who are already wondering why the United States, so determined and harmonious during hostilities, has demonstrated such division and indecision in diplomacy.

The world does not understand the details of the causes for our failure to agree on any terms of peace. It does know that for more than a year we have been disputing among ourselves. No doubt there is division abroad, as there is at home, as to whether obstinacy on the part of the Executive or political spite in the Senate is the chief cause which has rendered the treaty-making power unable to function.

The Senate is not justified in insisting that the occupation of Armenia by a small armed force of the United States for the alleged protection of the lives and property of American citizens there is the only proper procedure. Let me point out briefly the basis for this declaration.

In presenting his resolution to the Senate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] declared that while the alleged purpose in sending armed forces to Armenia is the protection of American citizens and their property, its real purpose is to maintain an existing line of communication.

Is this country to be committed openly to a policy of equivocation in its conduct affecting other nations? I do not question that the line of communication referred to should be kept open in the interest of the Armenians and in the interest of civilization, but I do doubt the wisdom of sending ships and soldiers to Armenia for the alleged purpose of protecting our citizens there, while at the same time admitting that the real purpose is a political and a military purpose vitally affecting and inseparably associated with governmental functions. If we are to govern Armenia, if we are to take the responsibility of keeping open lines of communication through Armenian territory, which is a governmental function, had we not better perform that task as a mandate, supported, as we would be, by the opinion and force of the civilized world, than to undertake it in a clandestine manner, censured, as we ought to be, by friendly nations for our lack of frankness and condemned by others for manifest duplicity?

The number of American citizens in Armenia is inconsiderable and their property is of little value. While I recognize that this is not a controlling consideration, and that in the protection of its citizens the Government's duty is not increased by large numbers or diminished by small ones, nor is it increased by vast property values nor diminished by small property values, yet it seems to me that those who oppose any mandate or similar relief and insist upon armed occupation are liable to criticism for maintaining a similar proposition, for their principal objection to a mandate is its cost. If the avoidance of expense is to control, resort either to armed occupation or to a mandate is of doubtful propriety. Moreover, under the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, agreed to unanimously by the Senate, such forces as we send to Armenia would have no authority to protect the lives and property of Armenians or other nationals. Their duties and powers would be limited to the protection of American citizens and their property.

If we seek to assume the broader obligation of preserving order and maintaining individual rights without regard to nationality, while avowing the sole purpose to protect Americans, probably a greater military force will be required if this Government proceeds in the manner outlined by the Harding resolution than from the exercise of the powers of a mandate under proper conditions, for in the latter case we would proceed under an authority recognized and approved by the principal nations of the world, while in the case of mere armed occupation our authority would not only be open to question by the enemies of Armenia, but it would be open to doubt by all and probably would be disputed by many of our friends. If the facts set forth in the report of Gen. George Van Horn Moseley, of the American military mission, are reliable, what assurance can Senators give this country that the appearance of a small force of American marines and a single armed American vessel at Batum and marines along the line of the railroad leading to Baku would not constitute an invitation to hostilities which would make necessary our participation finally in a foreign war under the greatest difficulties and with little or no support from those powerful nations whose appeals we reject and whose opinions we disregard when we refuse to accept the responsibilities of a mandate for Armenia and adopt a policy of armed occupation.

I know that the Committee on Foreign Relations impliedly concluded that no such danger exists, otherwise they could not have reported the resolution of the Senator from Ohio, which the Senate passed; but notwithstanding the very weighty consideration to which the opinion of that committee is entitled, let me ask Senators if it be true that Armenia is constantly being desolated by her oppressors, that she is surrounded on every side by treacherous and avaricious enemies, merciless in their wrath, and eager to plunder her, what benefit commensurate with the magnitude of the Armenian problem and the sufferings of the Armenian people can be accomplished by the sending of a single war ship and a small force of marines to the port of Batum for the protection of the few Americans to be found there?

Manifestly such action would be insufficient to accomplish the restoration and preservation of order in Armenia, and if we did anything more than the resolution on its face contemplates, our policy and performance, while defying the expressed opinion of our friends, would invite the hostility of our enemies, and thus in the end compel us to engage in a foreign war or to experience humiliation and disgrace.

Numerous as appear the difficulties of a mandate for Armenia from the report of the American military mission and the debates which have occurred in the Senate, it must not be forgotten that the mission found that the mandate could be made self-supporting and that the United States should not hesitate to accept that task, gigantic though it is.

I read the language of the commission:

> The mandatory would have to finance this situation until settled conditions prevailed, when the local taxes, which have in the past been very light, could be increased to cover the outlay being made by the mandate. Unquestionably the whole mandate could be made self-supporting.

That statement is found on page 31 of Senate Document No. 281, being the report by Brig. Gen. George Van Horn Moseley to Maj. Gen. Harbord, which report has been frequently referred to throughout the debate.

On page 19 of Senate Document No. 266, the military mission, after fully discussing the subject, reaches the conclusion that a mandate is the best way to control the situation in Armenia for the protection of its innocent people against their oppressors. I find the following language:

> The conclusion of the American military mission to Armenia is that the remedy for the existing conditions in Armenia and the Transcaucasus is a mandatory control to be exercised by a single great power.

Mr. President, I do not agree with the statements that have been made on the floor of the Senate that in proceeding to exercise the powers and duties of a mandate this Government necessarily would expose itself to the wrath of the world or to serious danger of attack from countries surrounding Armenia. It is contemplated by those who advocate the acceptance of the mandate that our Government shall dictate its own terms. It would be right and fair and proper, before accepting so great and important a responsibility, that the United States should inform her recent associates in the war fully as to the terms and conditions upon which she would be willing to undertake the task, and that she should refrain from doing so until those conditions had been fully accepted.

On page 24 of Document 266, already referred to, I find the following language:

> We would again point out that if America accepts a mandate for the region visited by this mission, it will undoubtedly do so from a strong sense of international duty, and at the unanimous desire—so expressed at least—of its colleagues in the League of Nations. Accepting this difficult task without previously securing the assurance of conditions would be fatal to success. The United States should make its own conditions as a preliminary to consideration of the subject—

And so forth.

Undoubtedly when that opinion was rendered it was expected that the United States would become a member of the League of Nations, but, Mr. President, the fact that the United States has not yet entered the league does not materially modify our obligations to Armenia and to the Armenian people. We are in part responsible for their present political condition.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has submitted a proposition to the Senate which in its principal features and purposes meets with my approval. It would be wrong for the United States to adopt the pending concurrent resolution without amendment. I believe that the effect of the adoption of the resolution will be to discourage the Armenians and to signify to the world that the United States is unwilling to render any assistance or any encouragement whatever to that very deserving people. The amendment of the Senator from Utah proposes, as a substitute for the concurrent resolution, the following:

> That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into arrangements with the allied powers, either through the supreme allied council or the council of the League of Nations, to cooperate on behalf of the United States with said powers or the members of the League of Nations for the proper protection of Armenia, including the advancement of supplies and commodities essential for the health and life of its people and the preservation of its political independence and territorial integrity.

Mr. President, that amendment would impose on the United States her fair share of responsibility as one of the victors in the great World War. It would not leave the United States alone to bear this burden, nor would it announce a policy on behalf of this Government of refraining to perform any act of assistance to the unfortunate Armenian people. It is a fair proposition, calculated to bring about results which the civilized world recognize should be accomplished.

I agree that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is better than the concurrent resolution. The Senate can do nothing more harmful to the standing of this Government as a Nation than to adopt without modification the concurrent resolution, for to reject these amendments, to refuse to provide any relief for Armenia, would be a clear indication that the position taken by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday that we should refrain from any assistance to our recent associates in the war which may involve the use of force is maintained by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri always speaks with great force; he always makes clear his position. I can not, however, refrain from taking issue with him on some of the propositions that he argued yesterday. He arraigned in the Senate the Armenian people as unworthy of assistance from the United States. He impliedly branded them as cowards and as brutal murderers. The language of the Senator on page 7968 of the RECORD of Monday, May 31, 1920, justifies that declaration. He said:

> I belong to that class of men who never attack a race as a race, for I know of no race that has ever attained to any degree of civilization that has not possessed many virtues and that has not produced some men of such eminence that they would adorn any other country by their presence and citizenship.

Then he proceeds to do exactly what he said he would not do. Continuing, he said:

> But when we speak of this question, we must consider the aggregate, and what of the Armenian in the aggregate?
> To begin with, if he was the right kind of a man, speaking broadly, the things that have occurred never could have happened. We are told that Armenians have been slaughtered, entire families put to death without a hand being raised. We read stories of Turkish soldiers coming to a home, murdering the entire family, including the husband and father, like so many pigs, and that no one was killed save the Armenians. That would not be possible with our race.

The Senator from Missouri continues in the same strain, portraying the valor, the sacrifice, and courage of American pioneers and how they struck in defense of their homes and of their families.

Mr. President, the Armenians are arraigned in the Senate by the Senator from Missouri because they have been massacred. The explanation of their inability to make defense is found in the report of Gen. Harbord:

> Meantime—

That is, during the period of the recent and unparalleled massacres—

> Meantime the Armenian, unarmed at the time of the deportations and massacres, a brave soldier by thousands in the armies of Russia, France, and America during the war, is still unarmed in a land where every man but himself carries a rifle.

Mr. President, the story of the suffering and of the oppression of the Armenian people extends back for centuries. Throughout that time they have been without the means of defense. It is, to say the least, uncharitable to characterize Armenians as being without courage and manhood because they have been massacred. The Senator from Missouri, continuing the same argument, said:

> But I step aside for a moment to call attention to the evidence of the character of this people.

He had already said by implication that they were cowards because they had been massacred when unarmed. Now he declares that because there have been occasional acts of reprisal, occasions when they have struck back, when in blind rage they have manifested cruelty, that is conclusive evidence that the Armenians are no better than their oppressors.

It is not surprising, sir, that a people who for ages have been hounded and persecuted and brutally butchered and murdered, whose women have been outraged, whose little girls have been sold into conditions worse than human slavery, should manifest wrath when the opportunity was afforded them. I maintain, sir, that the wholesale attack upon the character of the Armenian race comprised in the remarks of the Senator from Missouri which I have quoted is not justified and constitutes an additional wrong to a brave and a suffering people.

No mind familiar with history, no heart sensitive to the appeals of the oppressed, can be indifferent to the future of Armenia. The aspirations of Armenians for nationalism and liberty invoke the cordial sympathy and appreciation of Christian peoples everywhere. Through all the centuries which have passed since Christ was crucified, the principles of Christianity have been the accepted faith of the Armenian people. More than 17 centuries ago Armenians officially adopted Christianity. Throughout subsequent history they have exercised the religious faith which dominates our civilization.

Where else than in Armenia have cruelty and outrage been so persistent? In what other land has so much innocent blood been shed? What other people have sacrificed so much on the altars of Christian faith? Massacred by hundreds of thousands, and deported into conditions worse than slavery to the number of almost a million since 1915? their lands devastated, their property seized or destroyed, their women and little girls violated and sold as slaves. This mutilation and torture of an unoffending race, this age-long persecution of a people because of its religion, is the shame of modern civilization. What wonder that Armenians have been scattered? What wonder that millions of them live in unspeakable poverty? We encouraged them to fight in the cause of the Allies, with both the express and the implied promise that if we won, their persecutions should cease.

I do not justify the demand here presented for assistance to the Armenians from the Government of the United States solely on the ground that they are a Christian and a long-suffering people. I justify it as well on the ground of political morals and common decency. We encouraged them to enlist under the banner of the Allies. In the armies of France, in the armies of all the Allies, they fought, and they were the equal of any soldiery that ever went down to battle or ever breasted the flood of death. When the war ended, when the great guns became silent, and the rivers of blood ceased to flow, we owed some duty, as a victor in that combat, to the men who had helped us win the victory. What will it mean if now, having sent millions to France to fight for France, having told the world that it is the duty of all civilized peoples to fight back the barbaric Huns, who threatened the conquest of the world, having thus induced millions to engage in that combat—if we do what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday advocated that we should do—announce to the world that never again shall the sword of the United States be unsheathed save in defense of our own land? It will mean our own dishonor. It will mean despair to the Armenians.

Not by the rules of mercy and humanity alone but by the law of justice, the Armenians are entitled to protection at the hands of other Christian peoples. Armenian men are entitled to live and to toil. Armenian women are entitled to immunity from outrage. On the frontier of Christian civilization, surrounded by the foes of Christianity, who were the foes of the Allies in the late war, Armenians fought for freedom—for civil independence and religious freedom. They dashed to battle with unrestrained fervor and unexcelled courage. Thousands fell in the conflict. The one reward which the surviving Armenians claim is the right to live, to enjoy religious freedom and civil independence.

In view of recent history, what a selfish act on our part is proposed in the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations! By its terms we deny the assistance which the civilized world has invited us to render with its support. We withhold all encouragement from the Armenian people. The Methodist Church General Conference at its session in Des Moines, Iowa, on the 27th of May, unanimously adopted a resolution urging the United States to accept the mandate for Armenia. Do you imagine that this reflects merely the sentiment of a small part of organized Christianity in the United States? Every man who believes in the Cross and the principles taught by the founder of the Christian religion believes that this Government should do something for the protection of Armenia.

If Congress in its wisdom decides that we shall not accept the mandate, then let us confer with our allies and see that the Armenian people are not destroyed by their enemies. We owe that duty to them. Nothing else will satisfy the people of the United States.

If Congress adopts this resolution, if we deny the necessary authority for this Government to afford to Armenia the advice and assistance of a mandatory and provide no form of effective relief, Christianity on its eastern frontier will receive a staggering blow and the Crescent there will be uplifted above the Cross. If we do this thing, we will signalize the most pathetic incident in history—the doom of a patient and suffering race whose loyalty to the cause of humanity deserves a better reward from us than indifference close akin to treachery. If we decide that the age-long hard fight of the Armenians must end in failure and that the Crescent must be forever uplifted above the Cross in the land of the Armenians, if we leave them at the mercy of their Mohammedan oppressors, then let crêpe drape every altar in our land and let every church bell toll the knell of a dying race.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire in opening my remarks to call the attention of Senators to the map which hangs on the wall of the Senate Chamber, to which I am pointing. The map has an inscription on it, as follows:

Reproduced by Military Intelligence Division, General Staff.

It is an Army map. It is placed here at the request of a Senator for the purpose of showing the neighborhood of Armenia, about which the President's message is silent. I mean the President's message is silent as to the boundaries of Armenia, or what is meant by the term "Armenia."

In a general way this map shows a large portion of Asia Minor and indicates portions of Asia proper. It shows the east side of the Mediterranean Sea, the northerly portion of Africa, that portion of the Ottoman Empire known as Turkey in Europe, the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora, the Black Sea, Turkey in Asia, which is colored yellow on this map; then, east of Turkey in Asia, the portion of the map of a bluish lead color, which is marked "United States mandate." East of that, still, is a portion of the map of the same color as that which is marked "United States mandate," which includes Tiflis, Kars, and other Provinces. Nothing in the President's message indicates whether the latter strip is to be included in what is marked "United States mandate" or not. Then, north of the blue strip to which I have last referred is the great region, indicated on the map in white, called the Caucasus. Here is the great range of Caucasian Mountains which has been the cause for making the territory in which Armenia is located the pathway for thousands of years for the great swirls and migrations of races between Asia, running away over to China and the Yellow Sea, and from India westward through this narrow strip of land between the Caucasian Mountains and the Syrian Desert into the territory of Turkey in Asia, and thence across the narrow channels of the Dardanelles into Turkey in Europe, and then into the Balkans, and then on west through Europe.

It will be seen at a glance that this neck of land between the impassable Syrian Desert on the south and the Black Sea on the north and the Mediterranean on the west, the old Biblical, Scriptural land, has been the axis and center of the troubles of the world, occidental and oriental, ever since and prior to Biblical times.

All the races of the ancient civilizations of Italy and Greece, of Carthage and Phœnicia, of Egypt and Arabia, of Chaldea, Mesopotamia and Palestine, have mingled with the hordes of the Mongols. The Tartars, the Chinese, and the Russians, coming from the East, have all come in conflict here in this neck of land with the western civilization.

It is the site of the holy crusades, the battles of the Saracens of the desert, the ancient empires of Egypt and Syria and Assyria, the holy land of Palestine, the sacred tomb of Jesus of Nazareth, and in the Turkish land the sacred tomb of Mahomet, the prophet of Islam!

Mr. President, it is the plague spot of Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is the crossroads of the contagions and contests—moral, physical, religious, and otherwise—of the world.

Here, also, on this map is Persia, bounded on the south partially by Mesopotamia and the Persian Gulf and on the north by the Caspian Sea. Here is Mesopotamia, bounded on the south by the Syrian Desert, on the north by Persia and Armenia, and on the west by Syria. Here in green is the Syrian French mandate. I may say that in red here, in Mesopotamia and Persia, is marked on this map "British mandate." Palestine is in red—"British mandate."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just one second. All of Egypt and part of Arabia "British mandate," bounded on the north by the Mediterranean Sea. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. The area of the Syrian mandate has shrunk considerably before the bayonets of the Emir of Feysal.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; of course, Mr. President, these countries now are all seething from various national, international, and religious motives, aspirations, and hopes. The loose language of the President in mentioning "self-determination" of peoples as one of the 14 points has set the whole Orient aflame. Peoples now held in leading strings, and known as more or less "subject races," are now swirling and vibrating with nationalistic movements. Egypt wants to be free; the Syrians, over whom the French have been assigned a mandate, want to be free; the Arabians want to be free. Great national movements are now being conducted to throw off the leading strings of those who presume to hold them in subjection, and to develop according to their own racial, nationalistic, and religious tendencies.

This map, I see, has attached to it a piece of paper marked "Legend," and it states:

Great Britain's territory and sphere of influence in pink and red.

I ask anybody who is within sight of the map to look at the territory marked in pink and red, over which Great Britain's influence extends, and which is controlled by Great Britain, either by treaty or special arrangement or by mandates received from the League of Nations or the supreme council. It covers Persia, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Egypt, and the island of Cyprus.

Mr. President, that gives Great Britain control of half, at least, and I should say from the look of it on the map, two-thirds, of the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea, the whole Egyptian coast of Africa bordering on the Mediterranean Sea, the island of Cyprus, the frontage of Persia on the Caspian Sea, the frontage of Persia and of Mesopotamia on the Persian Gulf, and by its control of Constantinople and the Dardanelles, under their treaty arrangements, the control of the entrance and exit to and from the Black Sea. Of course, Great Britain also controls the entrance and exit at the west end of the Mediterranean Sea, through its control of Gibraltar and also Malta.

Mr. President, this paper glued to the map, which is apparently clipped from a newspaper, though the name of the paper does not appear, reads as follows:

BRITAIN GRABS LION'S SHARE OF BIG BOOTY AT SAN REMO.

SAN REMO, April 26.

When the San Remo conference breaks up Great Britain will walk off with the lion's share of the booty—enough to give her domination of Europe and possibly Asia, together with a monopoly of the world's oil supply.

Then a headline:

WHAT BRITAIN GETS.

Palestine.
Mesopotamia.
The rich oil fields of Baku and Batum.
Control of the Caucasus.
Control of the Dardanelles, the gateway to Asia.
Absolute right over the Suez Canal through control of Egypt and Turkish recognition of her protectorate.
The Turkish section of the Bagdad railway.
Practical security from a possible holy war by the Moslem world, in view of her defense of King Faisul's rights to the Arab kingdom.

WHAT FRANCE GETS.

A mandate for Syria and the moral satisfaction of lining up Britain and Italy with a strong front toward Germany.

WHAT ITALY GETS.

Britain's economic support and prestige with central Europe through Nitti's policy of reconciliation.

WHAT THE UNITED STATES GETS.

Polite little invitation to finance and protect with armies the tiny Republic of Armenia, a job that will cost this country several millions of dollars a year and require a permanent police force of 25,000 American troops.

Now, Mr. President, I do not call attention to that map for the purpose of accentuating the reference contained on the map to the British possession of strategic positions in this section of Asia. I call the attention of those who are here now to that map for the purpose of fixing the attention of those who are to consider this question upon the locus, upon something concrete in connection with the subject which is before us.

Mr. President, it is perfectly manifest by the physical configuration of the country, to which I have directed attention, that it is a strategic point of the world, not only as to its continental and intercontinental communications but as to the troubles which arise all over the world. It has there, and has had for countless thousands of years, every object and motive which can inspire trouble and fanaticism, bigotry, hatred, and lust in all the world. As I said, it contains the tombs of the founders of two great contending religions. What happens in Turkey or in Constantinople, what happens to the Sultan of Turkey, is not alone of moment in Turkey; it reechoes away down in East India and in China, throughout the Moslem possessions of Great Britain and other great powers all over the world.

Mr. President, it is well enough for people who are not called upon to commit this Government to any sort of policy to hold meetings and exhort us, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has so ably and beautifully exhorted us, to be sympathetic with human misery and distress in Armenia. That is very easy. Christian pulpits everywhere resound with the same topic. The people of America especially, and of England, too, have always sympathized with the wretched Armenians. They have always, of course, because they were brother Christians and because they seemed helpless in the hand of the Turks, sympathized with them. The House of Commons in Britain has resounded with the eloquent periods of British statesmen, before and since the time of Gladstone, denouncing the atrocities of the Turks and of the Turkish rule everywhere, and it has called upon the powers to take measures to suppress the bloody government of the Sultan. [Voices in the galleries pleading for the cause of Ireland.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will see that those persons are removed from the galleries.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As much as we sympathize with the Armenians, Congress is a responsible body in the authorization and direction of the governmental policies of this country. [Other voices in the galleries pleading for the cause of Ireland.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The doorkeepers will remove from the galleries the persons violating the rule of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was amazed, Mr. President, to have coming right out of a clear sky—and by that I do not refer to the galleries—to have coming right from the President of the United States, without any premonitory symptom or warning whatever, just as though it was a casual and to-be-expected recommendation, that we should accept a mandate for Armenia; and it must be noted that the President made no attempt whatever to define what Armenia was, because at the request of the powers he is to try to define it later on, and it can not be definitely defined now. Nor did he make any attempt to define what duties we should impose upon this country if we should give him power to accept the mandate which had been tendered.

One would think that, putting this proposition right up to Congress at this stage of the session, the President, who had participated in the Paris conference, at which time it was agreed that the countries which had formerly been under the Governments of belligerents during the war should be put under mandates, knowing all that was talked of there and what was agreed to, would have taken some pains to give us some information, so that we could decide this matter with more light than he has vouchsafed to give us. But I am particularly struck with this phrase of the President's communication:

I know—

Said the President—

from unmistakable evidences given by responsible representatives of many peoples struggling toward independence and peaceful life again that the Government of the United States is looked to with extraordinary trust and confidence, and I believe that it would do nothing less than arrest the hopeful processes of civilization if we were to refuse the request to become the helpful friends and advisers of such of these peoples as we may be authoritatively and formally requested to guide and assist.

That clearly shows that the President thinks it is not only our duty to accept a mandate for Armenia but for any other people—"many peoples," he said, such "as we may be authoritatively and formally requested to guide and assist." Just see what a vista that opens before us! If we accept this Armenian mandate, we establish the precedent. If it is our duty to be mandatary, which is guardian or international conservator, over the Armenians in Asia, and we admit that principle, then there is no people on the surface of the globe for whom we can decline to be guardian if only the supreme council, consisting of the prime ministers of Japan, Great Britain, Italy, and France, say that they want us to assume the mandate for them. There is no end to the job.

While the President does not give any definition of what would be our duties if we should accept this mandate, it will be noticed that he does say, and all he says in any part of his message is, that we should "guide and assist" them. I submit that is pretty vague.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and other Senators have quoted somewhat extensively from the report of Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, United States Army, of the American military mission to Armenia, which was presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on April 13 and is known as public document 266, and also from Senate document 281, which was the report made to Maj. Gen. Harbord by Brig. Gen. George Van Horn Moseley on the same question, presented by the Senator from Massachusetts on May 24, 1920. In my opinion, no sensible man can read those two reports without standing amazed at the task which is sought to be imposed upon the Government of the United States. I challenge the constitutional power of either the President or the Congress, or of both, to tax the people of the United States of America for the purpose of guiding, assisting, uplifting, or supporting the needy peoples all over the world. It has never before been asserted that the Government of the United States had any such constitutional power, and I here and now deny that it ever has or was intended to have any such power.

Let us see about that. This is a Government deriving its powers from delegation by the States. What powers did the States delegate to Congress to accept mandates for European and Asiatic countries and for their government? I know people dislike to look closely into a thing where their sympathies are involved and where they like, perhaps, to help some one in distress. That attitude might be all right for a private person or a philanthropist, but, Mr. President, we are trustees here dealing with money wrung by taxation from the people of this country, to expend under powers given to the Federal Government, and unless the people of the States have given to the Federal Government, of whom we are trustees, authority to tax them and spend their money by accepting a mandate over Armenia, we are attempting to steal their money if we use it for any such purpose. I think the Treasurer of the United States or the proper United States official could be enjoined in a suit in equity from spending money appropriated to maintain armies and navies over in Asia for the purpose of protecting the Armenians from the Turks.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For a question.

Mr. KING. Perhaps it will be a little broader than a question, but if the Senator thinks it is too broad I shall be very glad if he will so indicate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I only yield as long as I wish to.

Mr. KING. Permit me to ask the question of the Senator in this way: Assume that Hungary should rise from her prostrate position and make war within the next few months upon the new Jugo-Slav Republic, which has been, at least in part, organized out of the remnants of the Austrian Empire, does not the Senator think there would be a moral obligation, if not a legal one, resting upon the United States to cooperate with the leading nations for the purpose of protecting the new government which had been set up as a result of the war? Does not the Senator think that there is an analogy between the case which I have just supposed and the protection of Armenia, which has been set up as an independent government out of a part of the ruins of the Turkish Empire?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not think it is analogous; and if it was, I do not think it would change the question at all of whether we had constitutional power to do either. If we have declared war against any foreign power, we have the right to raise an army and a navy and to send them over there to wage the war, but we have not declared war against Turkey and we have not declared war against Armenia. By what authority the Congress is to appropriate money to organize expeditions to be sent to Armenia to take possession of its territory and to govern its people, I do not know.

The President talks about our "kindly advice and assistance." What are we going to do when we get there? Read these reports, to which I have called your attention—the Harbord report and the Moseley report. What they say has to be done is to establish a military government there, and that every civil officer there must be under the control of a military chief, and they talk about a governor general of military rank, and say that our military force is the best constituted one in the world to govern them in that way. The report says these people have always been used to being governed, that they never have governed themselves, and that what they need is a present, visible, military authority. That is not kindly assistance, to march in there like a satrap, backed by our Army and Navy, and take possession of millions of people and their territory, and proceed to govern them, and yet say it is for their benefit and for uplifting them.

Suppose after six months of enjoying the blessing of our notions of what is good for them they suddenly differ with us about the efficiency of our benevolence over there, then what are we to do? Supposing they break out in rebellion, are we to fight them, insisting upon protecting our mandate over them whether they want it or not?

Senators say that it might require a very small army there. It might at first take no more than these reports indicate, 50,000 or 60,000 men; but suppose the Kurds or the Turks come upon them and attack our army, we can not abandon them, I take it, but we have to put force enough up there to meet and suppress whatever force we encounter, or else haul down the American flag and get out.

We might as well look ahead. This sounds very harmless, as though it was a kind of Red Cross expedition to alleviate distress; but with the number of races and contentions that are concentrating upon that psychological center of trouble, we absolutely could not get out of there within a generation, according to these reports, and we would have to fight the world at every point of the circle if they came upon us.

But under whose authority are we presuming to equip these expeditions and send them over to Asia—just think of it, to Asia—to take possession of entire people? Under the authority of the covenant of the League of Nations, to which we have not subscribed! The Senate must understand that the President is presuming to operate under the covenant of the League of Nations now!

He says in his message—I read from page 2 of the message—

Early in the conferences at Paris it was agreed—

Agreed by him and the representatives of the other nations, but never by us—that to those colonies and territories which, as a consequence of the late war, have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be afforded.

Here is one of the securities that he is attempting to afford. I read from article 22 of the proposed covenant of the League of Nations incorporated in the treaty of peace with Germany, paragraph 2 on page 15 of the Senate print, Document No. 49:

The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be intrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience, or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as mandatories on behalf of the league.

Mr. President, let nobody fool himself with the idea that we are going over there with our armies and navies and experts and advisers and helpers and uplifters to do what we think ought to be done. We are going there in behalf of the league, Great Britain and France occupying the adjoining mandatory countries. Great Britain has Persia and Mesopotamia on the east and south of the country that we are going to govern and France has Syria on the east and south. I can imagine our acting as mandatory there, putting our principles into operation and doing as we think ought to be done by those people, and trying to satisfy Great Britain and France, who may themselves be at swords' points, and have been pretty nearly for the last six months over the government of this very same country and its surroundings. If we accept this mandate we shall be in Armenia not only as a mandatory of the league under the paragraph which I have just read from the League of Nations covenant, but shall be under an additional obligation to the league, which we have declined to enter; yet the President recommends that we shall accept such a mandate from it. I now read from the paragraph near the foot of page 15, the third paragraph from the last on the page:

In every case of mandate the mandatory shall render to the council—

That is, the council of the League of Nations—

an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

Not being in the League of Nations, the President by his message asks us to accept a mandate from the League of Nations, which we decline to enter, and to agree to account to it; that is, to administer our mandate to the satisfaction of the council of the League of Nations, which we decline to join. Could international madness proceed further than that, Mr. President?

I should like to hear somebody assert that Congress has power to grant to the President power to accept this invitation to govern Armenia, which is tendered to him by the prime ministers of the Old World. Who asserts that we have the power to do it? Surely this is a serious question. I am just as much opposed to congressional invasion of the Constitution as I am opposed to Executive invasion of the Constitution. We take an oath here, Mr. President, to support the Constitution of the United States.

I consider that it will be absolutely a plain, straight usurpation of authority on the part of myself, taking the view that I do of the Constitution, to vote to expend the money of the people or to use our military forces in time of peace in foreign lands to develop and provide for the well-being of foreign nations.

Mr. President, I should like to ask any constitutional student or lawyer what he thinks would be the fate of a proposed constitutional amendment if the Congress of the United States should propose to the legislatures of the several States to grant to Congress this power in words substantially as follows: Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes for the development and benefit of nations in Asia? Do you suppose you could get such an amendment to the United States Constitution ratified by the legislature of any one of the 48 States of America? It would not be ratified by one. The States would not give Congress any such power, and they never did give Congress any such power.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I apprehend the Senator from Connecticut would not question the right of this Government to acquire complete dominion and control over Armenia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not. We acquired complete control and dominion over the Philippines and they are now possessions of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. That proposition seems thoroughly settled.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The United States can acquire new territory.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And, of course, if it can acquire the Philippines, it can acquire Armenia and govern and control it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think so, although that is not the proposition we are considering.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, if the United States could exercise absolute sovereignty over Armenia, where is the constitutional objection to exercising a limited sovereignty over it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the United States can exercise absolute sovereignty over Armenia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will discuss that question when we get Armenia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the Senator from Connecticut may not understand——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I do. We acquired the Louisiana Purchase; we added that to our territory. After we got it there was no question that we could govern it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So, undoubtedly, we could acquire Armenia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If we acquired Armenia, it would be our business to govern it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And to exercise complete dominion over it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then what is the objection to exercising a limited sovereignty over it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Simply the objection that until we do acquire it, it is none of our business.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me further——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. When we had the much-debated question of the constitutionality of the League of Nations before the Senate, I recall that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], whose familiarity with that branch of the law is recognized on all hands, contended quite stoutly that the league covenant offended against the Constitution in a number of particulars; but I do not now recall that he even intimated that the provisions in relation to mandates were in violation of the Constitution. I had something to say about that subject myself on the 11th day of June last——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would rather the Senator would discuss that in his own time, because I am very limited in time, and I think am within five minutes or so of the expiration of my time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I admit that if we should acquire Russia, it would be our duty to govern it; but I hope that, because we would have absolute sovereignty over it after we had acquired it, nobody will contend seriously that we had partial authority over it before we had acquired it. Mr. President, we have no more right in Armenia at present than we have in China.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment further——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield for a question only.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We have not acquired Haiti; Haiti is an independent Government; and yet we exercise sovereignty over that island.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to become involved in Haitian, San Domingan, or Costa Rican discussion. I am claiming that it is very apparent to me that if we have any right in Armenia to-day we have equal right in every country on the globe, which heretofore we have made no claim to whatever, and I hope that the fever, the spirit, I may say the malignant disease, of internationalism has not so poisoned the native American common sense as that it wants to stick its nose and inject itself into every country in the world, on the theory that its self-determination is a matter of our constitutional concern and is a mere moral issue which we can not shirk without calling down upon us the condemnation of every other Christian power in the world.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gay	McCormick	Sheppard
Beckham	Gerry	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Capper	Harding	McLean	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Harris	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Harrison	New	Smoot
Culberson	Henderson	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Hitchcock	Nugent	Thomas
Dial	Kendrick	Page	Underwood
Dillingham	Keyes	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Knox	Pittman	Warren
Fernald	Lenroot	Poindexter	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pomerene

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

Mr. EDGE. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], and the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] on official committee work.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McCORMICK obtained the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I just want to offer an amendment to be pending at the proper time. I do not know whether it is in order to offer it now or not. I will ask the Chair if it is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then I offer this amendment:

In the committee resolution, strike out the words "respectfully declines to grant" and insert in lieu thereof the word "grants," so that, if amended, it will read:

That the Congress hereby grants to the Executive the power to accept a mandate over Armenia as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

I shall not support the amendment myself; but I know there are so many of my friends who are anxious that the President shall have this power that I want to give them an opportunity to vote for it.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] doubtless will put an end to the hesitation and will resolve the doubts of Senators on the other side of the Chamber, to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] referred when he asked that the vote upon the concurrent resolution might be postponed because so many among his Democratic colleagues had not yet been able to make up their minds how they would vote on the resolution as reported by the committee.

It is not necessary to challenge the good faith of the tender of this mandate in order to suggest that its proffer to the United States is evidence of that cynicism which sometimes characterizes the course of diplomacy and the conduct of affairs among peoples. At intervals during the last few months candid avowals which bear the marks of inadvertence have disclosed that with the current of idealism along which statesmen have been borne there runs a current of realism as marked as that which distinguishes the waters of the Missouri from those of the Mississippi below the juncture of the rivers. The powers which at San Remo united to invite the United States to accept the mandate for Armenia were those whose armies fought and died in the Crimea to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire and the dominion of the Turk over the Christian populations of his Empire.

The scepter of the Sultan long since would have fallen from his feeble and degenerate grasp if his hand had not been borne up by the very Christian powers of Europe which, having divided among themselves those parts of the Empire which have economic resources and which are strategically important, offer to the United States that part which, by the United States at least, is militarily indefensible and of which the economic resources are nil.

It is true that the Christian populations of the powers which have defended the Moslem against the Christian have time and again spoken out in protest against the actions of their governments; but the views of the governments, determined by the exigencies of oriental commerce and diplomacy, have prevailed against the emotions of the population.

In his day, sir, William E. Gladstone, in behalf of the Christian people of England, protested against the atrocities perpetrated by the unspeakable Turk, against the course of Disraeli's government, just as Robert Cecil has protested to-day. Disraeli's government successfully persisted in its support of the Turk, just as Lloyd-George's government has insisted upon the Sultan's remaining in Constantinople, because in this he dare not cross the Moslem subjects of the British Crown, who outnumber the Christian subjects of George V.

I said a moment ago that the proffer of this mandate gave evidence of that cynicism which sometimes marks the course of diplomacy. Senators will remember that when the powers met at Berlin to tear up the treaty of San Stefano, to restore to the misrule of the Sultan Christian populations made free by the Russo-Turkish War, that at the Congress of Berlin and privy from its members, Lord Beaconsfield secured, in substance, the cession of Cyprus to the British Crown in return for a British guaranty of the Turkish Empire.

During the course of the peace conference at Paris, Lord Milner consummated in secret and behind his allies' backs the Anglo-Persian treaty, which, in substance, surrenders Persia to British suzerainty, as Cyprus was surrendered to British suzerainty.

A study of the map shows that the oil-bearing area of Mesopotamia abuts on the oil-bearing area of Persia.

In the name of order and under the aegis of the league, the mandate for Mesopotamia was offered to Britain and accepted by Britain, because of the oil there, as Mr. Lloyd-George, in one of those pellucid moments of his, avowed in the House of Commons the other day. The frontier was drawn above Mosul because of the oil about Mosul, and despite the vehement, nay, the bitter, protests uttered in France.

France found her portion of the Levant, exiguous at the best, shrinking during the course of the negotiations. The Emir Faisal, the son of the King of the Hedjaz, who had come into the war under the guidance of the British Col. Lawrence, was proclaimed King of Syria, and his supporters, in an all-Syrian Congress, proceeded to demand that such part of the Levant which, under mandate, the supreme council purposed to allot to France, should be Syrian-Arab. The map on yonder wall does not show that, although France holds the littoral, it has been necessary to yield the country from Homs to Damascus to the Syrian Government of Veisal.

The cables report, too, that the French have fought their way back into Aintab, from which they were expelled by arms.

Any tyro looking at the map will realize that, as against either or any of the great powers holding strong places in the Mediterranean, whether outposts of Great Britain, like Malta or Gibraltar, or naval bases like those in peninsular Italy and on the coast of southern France—anyone will realize against any of these powers the United States in Armenia would be able to offer no resistance. Nay, more than that, the Balkan powers, united, could cut off all communication between America and her forces in Armenia; our troops would be but hostages. If it was desired that a disinterested people, moved by no self-interest, should be intrusted with the duty of guiding the freed population of Turkey in Asia; if such a people were to be intrusted with the development of the country and its protection, why, then, was a mandate for Mesopotamia, rich in oil, and whose valleys will drive the American cotton out of the markets of Europe, why was not the mandate to Mesopotamia as well as that of Armenia offered to the United States? Was it because another power wished to drive American cotton out of the markets of Europe; that another power wished to exploit the oil resources of central Asia in its effort to secure a monopoly of the oil supply of the world?

If America was to be invited to guard the harried populations and the territories endeared to the Christians of the world, how was it that Jerusalem and the Holy Land were not offered to the United States under the form of a mandate?

Armenia is defensible by the United States only against weak surrounding populations. The presence of American armies there, of course, is sought by the diplomatists of Europe to enlist the whole strength of America if Russian armies were to descend to recover those lands which once were Russian by conquest; not only that, but to defend against Russia British interests in Persia.

Senators will have noticed how the armies of Bolshevist Russia, the other day, came down the Caspian and along the shores through Daghestan past Baku and occupied the Persian port of Enzeli, flanking the greater part of the eastern frontiers of the proposed Armenia. Here is a promise that the American troops who finally were brought out of Russia, because of the insistence of Senators in this Chamber, may yet be returned to wage the same undeclared war they waged before.

There is no end to the possibility of interminable internecine strife in hither Asia, in which diplomats seek to draw us under the dissimulation of idealism, but really to guard the material interests of other powers.

There are no illusions in Europe, sir. I have received to-day a letter from a friend of mine, sitting in one of the great parliaments of continental Europe, in which he speaks of the consequences of the partition of the Turkish Empire. I translate as I read:

> Do not forget that these peoples of the Ottoman Empire belong to 20 different races who for 25 centuries have continually quarreled and battled among themselves. When to these enduring ethnic rivalries there are added new rivalries—American, British, French, Italian, Greek rivalries—the situation can not but go from bad to worse. The society of nations—gelatinous chimera—> the society of nations—gelatinous chimera—will never be able to keep the peace in that country.

There are few, if any, Senators in this Chamber who would refuse to join in furthering a voluntary movement to underwrite a loan in the interest of Armenia, to permit those who wished to volunteer in armies for the defense of Armenia, or to train Armenian armies to go hither, but if the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is submitted for the decision of the Senate, does anyone doubt the overwhelming judgment which will be passed upon it?

Watchful waiting, Mr. President, was a policy adopted toward our turbulent neighbor. We entered Mexico on the homeopathic plan and withdrew. Now it is proposed that we enter wholly into the responsibility for the ordering, the government, and the protection of Armenia. Murder, rapine, hunger, anarchy, all are at our very doors, while we, with unctuous phrases, have turned our faces from them. Now, moved by some madness, we seek to go afield to do that which we have shrunk from doing here.

This is the promise of what may be our lot time and again if we assume the obligations of the covenant which has been submitted to the Senate.

Men hither and yon about the world will seek to send our Army on the same mission which would take them, under the proposed mandate, to Armenia. It is not only in Armenia that populations have suffered or will suffer from misrule and disorder. The revolutionary agitations which are shaking the Asiatic and African populations subject to European powers promise disorders in every quarter of the two continents during the years to come. If we put our hand to the plow now, we can never turn back. We shall plow the furrow which will be sown with salt and fertilized in the blood of our young men. The tender of this mandate brings home the reality behind the iridescent vision of the League of Nations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I shall be very brief in my discussion of the pending resolution, because, fortunately for the country, there is no considerable sentiment anywhere in the Senate for the acceptance of the mandate.

We must assume that when the President of the United States asked the Congress to accept the mandate for Armenia, he did so with full knowledge of the contents and recommendations of the Harbord mission. This mission was organized under the authority of President Wilson and therefore we have the right to assume that when he asked the Congress to accept the mandate, it is implied that he asks the authority of Congress to send 60,000 American boys to Armenia for the maintenance of law and order there, that he asks an appropriation from this Congress to the extent of $276,000,000 for the first year for the rehabilitation of Armenia, that in the first five years he asks appropriations of $756,000,000 from Congress to carry out this mandate. That is what this implies, asking Congress to accept a mandate for territory having no valuable resources, England and France having accepted or will accept mandates for all the contiguous territory having rich oil wells, copper mines, and agricultural lands.

Mr. President, there is and there will be no considerable sentiment in the United States for the acceptance of this mandate under the circumstances. The synopsis of the report of the Harbord mission has been placed in the RECORD, but I wish to insert just two or three paragraphs from it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me I wish to suggest that, of course, inasmuch as the boundaries of Armenia are not yet fixed, but are to be determined by the President in the future, the estimates of the Harbord mission will have to be somewhat reduced if he fixes a smaller territory than that report contemplates.

Mr. LENROOT. I may be mistaken, and if I am I shall be glad to have the Senator from Connecticut correct me, but I do not understand that the President is to fix all the boundaries of Armenia. It is only certain boundaries that he is given authority to fix.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. Of course we have no definite information about what the President intends to do, but as I understand it, there are boundaries that he is to fix between Armenia and Turkey, and if fixed in certain ways it might and probably would reduce the area of Armenia somewhat from that contemplated by the Harbord mission; but, of course, the principle remains the same.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true; and while, as the Senator says, our information is most meager, I do not believe there is any authority either vested in or requested of the President of the United States to have anything to do with the boundaries that might give to Armenia valuable resources by the action of President Wilson.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I suggest to the Senator also that while the powers who offered this mandate to the United States agreed that whatever the President shall say about the boundaries shall be final and conclusive, as far as they are concerned, there is no provision whatever that those boundaries shall be satisfactory to the parties concerned, the people who are to be handed about at the discretion of the President?

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to read this paragraph from the report of the Harbord mission:

> Estimates of the necessary number of mandatory troops vary greatly—from 25,000 to 200,000. Conditions change so rapidly that plans made to-day for the use of troops might be obsolete in six months. Uncertainty as to the time the mandate will be tendered and accepted make estimates merely approximate. Under conditions as they exist to-day the undersigned believes that a force of two American divisions, with several hundred extra officers, or a total force of 59,000, would be ample. Such force would be specially organized; one aeroplane squadron; a minimum of Artillery; not to exceed one regiment of 75's motorized; a minimum of the special services; four times the usual number of sanitary troops; four regiments of Cavalry, with minor changes in organization at the discretion of the senior general officer on duty with the mandatory government. This force should be substantially reduced at the end of two years, and by 50 per cent at the end of the third year. After that some further reduction could be slowly effected, but the irreducible minimum would be reached at about the strength of one division.
> The annual cost for the force of the Army above stated would be at the maximum:

For the first year	$88,500,000
At the end of two years, perhaps	59,000,000
At the end of three years	44,250,000

Later on in the report, where the mission gives in parallel columns the reasons for and the reasons against accepting the mandate, I read from the column giving the reasons against acceptance, the following:

> Our country would be involved in this adventure for at least a generation, and in counting the cost Congress must be prepared to advance some such sums, less such amount as the Turkish and Transcaucasian revenues could afford, for the first five years, as follows.

Then is given in detail for the first year the itemized expenditures, amounting to $275,000,000. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the complete table of the expenditures which would be involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

FIRST YEAR.
General Government	$100,000,000
Communications, railroads, etc	20,000,000
Relief, repatriation, education, etc	50,000,000
Army and Navy	88,500,000

Grand total	756,014,000

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to a thought which occurs to me in connection with the figures just cited. I assume that those estimates, both of men and of money, proceed upon the theory that the efforts of the American troops under an American mandatory for the pacification and stabilization of Armenia would not be interfered with in a military way by any other power; but if we should be attacked in this process of setting these people upon their feet by Turks or Kurds or other outside powers there is no knowing what the requirements of men and money might be.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly; I was just coming to that. Where they name a maximum of 200,000 troops, it is contemplated that they may be attacked. The figure is really a minimum upon the theory that law and order will be maintained without attacks from the outside, whereas it is more reasonable to assume that if we shall go in there with our soldiers they will not act merely as policemen but they will be called upon to fight—to fight the Kurds, to fight the Turks—and we will have large losses of American life there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator really think that the report when it mentions 200,000 men means that as a maximum? Was it not a varying estimate of from 25,000 to 200,000 as conditions then existed? Suppose, however, there should be an invasion of Soviet Russia, would it not require a million men?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are possibilities of requiring more men than we had in France.

Mr. LENROOT. When I stated that 200,000 men was the maximum estimate it was upon the theory that there would be roving attacks from the territory contiguous to Armenia; but, of course, it did not contemplate a possible attack by Soviet Russia, because in such a case we would be involved in a world-size war if we had the mandate of Armenia.

Mr. President, while, of course, Congress may have—and I do not care to discuss the question to-day—the legal right, or the Government may have the legal right to accept a mandate of this character—which, I think, is a very serious question—and, assuming that they do possess such a right, this Congress has no moral right to enter into any such an undertaking until the American people have had the opportunity to have the question fully discussed before them and have had a chance in some way to pass upon it.

I venture to say that neither political convention soon to be held will declare for a mandate for Armenia. As to the Senators upon the other side of the aisle who are following President Wilson and propose to vote for a mandate for Armenia, I would be willing to say that their convention at San Francisco will not even consider the subject, and, if it does, there will be no more votes in proportion in the Democratic national convention for the mandate than there will be Democratic votes here to-day for the mandate. That is acknowledged. Is this a Government representative of the people? If it is, we have no moral right to accept this mandate at all at this time.

Mr. President, I think we all, irrespective of party affiliations, are anxious to do those things which we may properly do for Armenia. I sympathize with Armenia, and I do not question that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has offered the amendment which he has prepared with the sincere purpose of aiding Armenia without involving the United States in the European question in the form of a mandate or otherwise; but the amendment proposed by him and now pending does put the United States Government into Armenia. I think I shall be able to demonstrate that in just a moment. If I am correct in that, it puts the United States Government into Armenia, but in such a way as will not be any substantial protection to the Republic of Armenia, for, if the amendment is adopted, it will tend to deter other countries from any effort to protect Armenia; it will, in my judgment, prevent any other country from accepting a mandate for Armenia, and, if Armenia is to be governed by mandate from any country, it ought to be from some country over there in Europe. If it should not tend to keep another country from accepting a mandate, the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would be in direct conflict with any other mandatory power which may accept a mandate.

Further than that, the amendment proposes to legislate for the Republic of Armenia, which, of course, is an impossible thing.

What does it provide?

> That the President be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint three American citizens to act with a like number of representatives of the Government of Armenia in the organization of a joint commission, the six so chosen to select a seventh person as chairman. Said joint commission shall be charged with the duty of supervising the preparation, issuance, offering for sale, and sale in the United States of bonds of the Armenian Government, not exceeding $50,000,000 in amount, the proceeds of which shall be available—

And so forth.

That is to say, under the amendment if Armenia appoints three members of a commission to join a commission of seven created by the United States, then the United States legislates as to the form of the bonds that shall be issued by the Republic of Armenia. Not only that, but it gives to the proposed joint commission the power to issue the bonds. All that is required of Armenia is to appoint three commissioners, and then the United States, with its three commissioners and the three commissioners from Armenia, with the chairman, are to issue bonds and bind the Republic of Armenia, which, of course, can not be done.

But, passing that for the moment, the authority to use the proceeds of these bonds is limited, first, to the purchase of agricultural implements, and so forth, in the United States, for the rehabilitation of Armenia, with this proviso:

> Provided, That not to exceed one-half of this amount may be used for the purpose of rehabilitating and establishing a sound banking and currency system for Armenia in case the Armenian Government may so decide under the advice and approval of this joint commission.

Suppose, Mr. President, that Great Britain takes a mandate for Armenia; does anyone imagine that we could enter into an arrangement, even with the consent of the Republic of Armenia, that the United States should go into Armenia through the proposed commission and advise and approve of the establishment of a banking and currency system in the Republic of Armenia? It will be the duty and the business and the responsibility of whatever nation takes the mandate to do that very thing. There can not be any question about that. What else would a mandate be for, aside from furnishing the force and the money necessary for the protection of the people?

So if the amendment is adopted we confront this situation: The Government of the United States as a Government, through its appointive representatives, is in Armenia supervising and approving its rehabilitation and the establishment of a banking and currency system there; and if we are going into the Republic of Armenia that far, Mr. President, the situation will be hopeless for Armenia so far as protection from any other power of Europe is concerned, for it will be said, of course, that if the United States is in the Republic of Armenia, if the United States has undertaken to supervise and administer its internal affairs, the United States must take full responsibility also for the maintenance of law and order there. That would be a very reasonable position for any other power to take. On the other hand, if, notwithstanding our action, some other nation should accept the mandate for the Republic of Armenia, and that nation, carrying out its responsibilities as mandatory, should undertake, with or without the consent of the Republic of Armenia, to establish a banking and currency system there, we would have a conflict between a commission in part representing the United States of America using $25,000,000 of money raised in the United States and attempting upon its part to interfere with the duties and responsibilities of the regularly constituted mandatory.

So, Mr. President, from the standpoint of Armenia itself, from the standpoint of the future of Armenia, the amendment should not be adopted. Nor should it be adopted from the standpoint of the responsibilities and duties of the United States of America, for if it once enters upon the government in any way of the Republic of Armenia it will be followed by a well-founded demand that if we accept some of the responsibilities of government there we must accept them all. Therefore, from the standpoint both of the welfare of Armenia and the welfare of the United States the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska ought not to be adopted.

Mr. President, I do not believe that this Congress should adjourn without attempting to do something for the relief of Armenia.

What I should like to see done, what I believe would be of very great help to Armenia, would be the national incorporation of a voluntary organization with authority to become the fiscal agent in the United States of the Republic of Armenia, if such agency is tendered it by Armenia. Of course, what is desired, what the Senator from Nebraska undertakes to secure, I take it, by this amendment, is to have a feeling of security upon the part of those people in the United States who may subscribe for these Armenian bonds, and to know that the money that they subscribe for them is being expended for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the Republic of Armenia. They want to know that whoever that fiscal agent is, great profit is not being made by that fiscal agent for that purpose; and therefore if we have under national incorporation a voluntary organization whose only purpose is to aid Armenia, such as we have had in many other cases, with the power to accept from the Republic of Armenia a fiscal agency with such powers and responsibilities as the Republic of Armenia may delegate to them, then the public in the United States subscribing for the bonds would have the confidence that the Senator from Nebraska attempts to secure by his amendment.

I do not say that it should accompany this resolution, because the one thing that is being dealt with here is whether or not the United States shall accept the mandate; but I should be glad to see, either with this or as a separate resolution, such a joint resolution passed, providing for such an incorporation.

For the reasons I have given, Mr. President, I am not only opposed to the acceptance of the mandate, but I am opposed to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

In conclusion, permit me to say that unless the President of the United States is utterly oblivious of public sentiment in this country, I can not understand how or why he ever asked the Congress of the United States to accept this mandate. If he is informed at all as to the sentiment of Congress, if he is informed at all as to the sentiment of the country, he must have known when he sent this message to Congress that the mandate would not be accepted. Therefore, the only result of his making this request has been to build up for the time being the hopes of European countries which he must have known could not and would not be fulfilled.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no idea of arguing the case of the mandate. It seems to me altogether too clear to require argument. To invite this country to take charge of that crossroads of the nations in Armenia, to commit itself to sending its troops there for an indefinite period, and to bear the expenses involved for an indefinite period, is something for which I could never bring myself to vote. I doubt its constitutionality, and it seems to me in all ways the wrong thing to do; but by my vote to-day I do not want to give the impression that I have no sympathy for the Armenians, for I have the deepest possible sympathy for them, and I have tried in many ways to help them. I do not desire to have this country give the impression, through any action of Congress, that it is not sympathetic. The Armenians are a gallant people who have struggled through the centuries to maintain themselves in independence and to uphold their own religion. I think they deserve help. There are many ways in which they can be helped which would not involve the United States at all. One is the corporation proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Another method is one which has been discussed in the Committee on Foreign Relations, to suspend the foreign enlistment act, and allow them to enlist Armenians in this country for service in Armenia, as we permitted the Polish Legion to be enlisted in this country; to furnish them, if necessary, with surplus arms, and in that way give them a real assistance, in addition to the great voluntary gifts of some $40,000,000 which have been sent there for relief.

That is all I desire to say. I wanted to take this occasion to express, as I have before, my deep sympathy with the Armenians and my desire to aid them; and that is not impaired in the least by the fact that I consider that taking a mandate for Armenia, as proposed by the President, would be a grievous wrong to the people of the United States. Even if we have the constitutional power, I do not want to send the soldiers of the United States for indefinite service in Armenia, and to give their lives in quarrels which we can not anticipate, but in quarrels not their own, and to which their own country would not summon them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I can not permit the vote on this concurrent resolution to be taken without expressing briefly my reasons for any vote which I may hereafter be called upon to cast.

I very much regret that this resolution is now before the Senate of the United States for disposition. I very much fear the effect which a defeat of this resolution, in the form that it is proposed to amend it by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], may have upon the fate of the surviving Armenians. I very much regret that we are in a position where we must take some definite action either for or against this resolution at this time. I very much regret that this resolution is not now before the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that it may be further studied with a view to determining what action the Congress of the United States might take for the protection of the Armenians, and at the same time accord with the desires of the American people.

I shall be forced, if I am compelled to vote, to cast my vote against this mandate in its present form; and, Senators, if we should refuse to do anything at the present time for the aid of the Armenians, and the Turks should renew their murderous assaults upon this helpless people, could the American Government and the American people hold themselves entirely guiltless if it is to go out that the American people refuse to do anything for the aid of the Armenians?

That is the one phase of this question which troubles me very seriously; but if we are to vote in favor of a mandate now, what does it mean? Let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President, in his recent message, tells us that he has been requested by the Allies to accept this mandate on behalf of the United States, and then he says to the Senate further:

> In response to the invitation of the council at San Remo, I urgently advise and request that the Congress grant the Executive power to accept for the United States a mandate over Armenia.

Before adverting to what that means permit me also to call the attention of the Senate to a provision in article 22 of the peace treaty. This says:

> Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone.

Now, let us observe how indefinite is the request which comes to the President of the United States from the council abroad. How indefinite is the President's request that he be authorized to accept this mandate! And if we accept it, what does it mean? Why, under the covenant of a League of Nations, it means that we shall be authorized to "give administrative advice and assistance." What kind of advice? What kind of assistance? To what extent shall we give assistance? Is it financial? Is it administrative? Is it military? And if we are to authorize the President of the United States, on behalf of this Government, to accept the mandate, what are we giving him? Who of us can go before our constituents and answer the question, "What did you mean when you voted to accept this mandate? Did you mean that you were to give to them aid to the extent of twenty-five or a hundred millions? And if you were to extend this aid for one year, for how many years?"

Does it mean that we are to furnish an Army, and if so, what sized Army—10,000, 200,000? I do not know. I know nothing about it; the American people know nothing about it at the present time. All we can say is that the Harbord mission presented a report; and it is an able report; it is very comprehensive; but it is very indefinite as to the size of the Army we might have to furnish. We do not know whether it means 25,000 or 200,000. Gen. Harbord and his mission do not know.

Mr. President, let us look at this situation from another angle. The Government of the United States embraces only one part of our sovereignty. Our Congress is clothed with limited powers. Our Executive is clothed with limited powers. We look to the Constitution itself to see what these powers are, supplemented by congressional action. In other words, the Chief Executive of the United States has limited powers only, and yet those who favor this mandate seek to confer upon the Federal Government, clothed with limited powers, unlimited power when it comes to dealing with the Armenian people, if we accept that mandate.

Shall a Government with limited power be permitted to exercise unlimited power? It does seem to me that the Congress of the United States can not justify itself until we know in advance what the powers are that it is supposed to exercise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I interpret the attitude of the Senator correctly, I dissent from his position and conclusions. I am addressing him for the purpose of ascertaining whether I have misconstrued his position. As I understood the Senator, he takes the position that if we grant the mandate as requested by the President there is a conferrence upon the President of unlimited power and that he would not be subject to congressional limitations; that any commitment which he might make would bind this Government.

I assume, if the Senator will pardon me, that if we should accede to the request of the President and grant the mandate the work of the President and the action of the President would be such that it would be determined from time to time by congressional legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. And he could do nothing except that which Congress authorized him to do.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly the Senator is correct as to that; but I am speaking of the legislative situation as it is now. If we confer this mandate now, without any limitations, then it is unlimited power he has, until we see fit to limit it by further congressional action.

Mr. KING. It would be improper, of course, for me to trespass upon the time of the Senator, but I could not assent to that conclusion.

Mr. POMERENE. It may be that I am wrong, but I think not. However, whether I am right or wrong, I do not feel justified in conferring a power which even the Senator from Utah must agree is very indefinite and very comprehensive.

Mr. President, my heart goes out to these people. I want to do something for them. The American people want to do something for them. But what? The committee which had this in charge have not told us. I know they are not without sympathy toward these people. We had a meeting and it was discussed. I was not able to be there, because at the time I was engaged in a very important hearing on another matter. But it seems to me the committee should take jurisdiction of this subject again and work out something which would meet with the approval of the United States Senate and of the American people, and I am afraid that whatever action we take upon this resolution here will by the Turks be regarded as a finality.

It stirs one's blood when he reads this Harbord report and finds, according to the best estimate of the Harbord mission, that the dead of Armenia, due to the murderous assaults of the Turks, are variously estimated at from five hundred thousand to a million men, women, and children, the usual figure being given as 800,000.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with the Senator and with all others who express sympathy with the Armenians. Of course, it goes without saying that it is horrible to contemplate the human suffering, so much of which is now going on all over Europe and in Asia. The Senator says he thinks that if this matter were recommitted to the committee, the committee could work out something which would be satisfactory all around. In view of the fact that there is no definition whatever of what constitutes a mandate, either in the treaty, in the covenant of the League of Nations, or in the President's message advising the acceptance of this particular mandate, and in view of the fact that the committee can have no access to the President, or to the supreme council which counseled the President to counsel us to accept this mandate, how in the world can the committee work out anything satisfactory all around?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is a fair question. The position of the Senator and of the committee thus far, so far as the affirmative action of the majority of the committee is concerned, is a purely negative position, and I have such supreme confidence in the ability of the Senator from Connecticut and those who generally vote with him that I believe they can work out something of a constructive nature which will be a relief to these poor people.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator, in all good faith, if he can conceive how the position of the committee, left in the haze in which it is, and in which the Senator confesses himself to be, could be anything but a negative position? How can we take a positive position on this question?

The Senator started out by saying that he regretted, or words to that effect, that we were in a position where we had to say something definite. That is the position which the President puts us in.

Mr. POMERENE. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He simply says: "Please advise me yes or no. Give me the authority to accept this mandate. Will you do it?" We can not do anything but say, "Yes" or "No" and be in good faith.

Mr. POMERENE. No; Mr. President, let us accept our share of this responsibility

Mr. BRANDEGEE What responsibility?

Mr POMERENE. It is true that the President came with the suggestion that he be clothed with a power to accept a mandate, but he has not attempted to limit the action of the Congress to an affirmative acceptance or a denial of the mandate. The whole subject is before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I agree that the subject is before the Congress, because the President has sent a message to Congress; but the Senator can not tell what the subject is except by saying the words "a mandate." But the subject is only before Congress for the purpose of telling the President whether it will grant him power to accept a mandate which is tendered to him by the foreign powers, and the subject before Congress is for us to advise the President whether he can give an answer to the powers who are waiting for an answer from him.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I do not like to question things about which I am not certain, but it seems to me that this is the situation: The Senator from Connecticut agrees with me that something ought to be done. It comes as one of the promptings of the human heart when we see our fellow men in distress, as the Armenians are. Yet we are to content ourselves with simply saying to the President and to the world, "We will do nothing." We are not doing anything.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not want to be put in any such position as that.

Mr. POMERENE. I knew the Senator did not want to be put in that position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not put myself there.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator has, with all due respect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object to the Senator from Ohio attempting to put me in the position of doing nothing about Armenia. I want to do exactly what I think we ought to do. I want to answer a civil question propounded to us by the President, so that he can give a square answer to the European powers who put it up to him.

Mr. POMERENE. What does the Senator suggest should be done, then?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator, of course, might ask me what I think ought to be done with the Bolsheviki, or to make everybody happy in Russia. I do not want to take the Senator's time in telling him all my thoughts.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that the Senator does not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to do anything I can at the proper time for Armenia. I do not think we should attempt to make an answer to the President upon a specific request the vehicle to interpolate all our benevolent ideas about what ought to be done for Armenia, which is the question before us.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think that if we had before us just the question as to what should be done with the Armenians, and would keep out of our minds the fact that the suggestion of a mandate comes from the President, we would be able to settle this question.

Now, Mr. President, a word further. As other Senators, I have received from time to time letters bearing on this subject from eminent divines and others who have been in close touch with Armenia for years. They want something done. They have not been able to advise, save that they would like to have us take control and be there in defense of these stricken Armenians. But in the course of some of this correspondence I have put the question before them in a very practical way, and I have reminded them that if we are to accept a mandate, and it becomes necessary to send our Army abroad, there are only two ways to raise this Army—one is by accepting volunteers and the other is by conscription—and then I put the question, "Have you any sons or are there any members of your congregation who will volunteer for this purpose; or if there is conscription and your sons or the members of your congregation are selected, will they willingly go?" I am yet to receive an answer to that suggestion.

That makes it all the more difficult. In my humble judgment the best way to meet the question is this: I have been one of those who have always wanted to have the treaty ratified, and I am willing to vote for it with any reservations that will meet the approval of two-thirds of the Senate voting. If the treaty were ratified, then there would be a community of interest among the various allies, and if the Congress in its wisdom saw fit to authorize the acceptance of this mandate, we then at least will have the moral support of all these allies; but now, if we are to accept the mandate in this form before the treaty itself is ratified, then it is our responsibility and ours alone. I can not justify myself before the American people to vote for a mandate at this time under these circumstances and under these conditions, but I shall always be ready to council with my brethren here or elsewhere to the end that we can give some protection, some relief, to this people that has suffered so much.

I do not forget that during the war we, with our allies, encouraged these people in their revolt against their masters. We led them to believe that they should have their place in the family of nations——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. In just a moment I will yield. Now, shall it be said of us that we have made the promise to the ear only to break it to the hope?

I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I did not rise in any controversial spirit, but I am interested in the statement of the Senator that we encouraged the Armenians to rise, and he meant, of course, to revolt. How was that brought about?

Mr. POMERENE. When I made that statement I did not have reference particularly to the Armenian people. I had reference to all the subject nations—the Czecho-Slovaks, the Jugo-Slavs, the Poles, the Armenians as well. We joined with all these people in doing the best we could not only to fight our own battles but to demoralize the enemy's forces as well.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Would the Senator throw the mantle of our charity and protection over suffering peoples who were not involved in this war?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator will do me the credit to believe that I only referred to the subject peoples of our enemies. It was they whom I had in mind.

Mr. McCORMICK. All others must suffer, then?

Mr. POMERENE. No, not at all; but that is a problem that we can take care of when we are in the league. We can not do it outside of the league.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me suggest to the Senator that at our doors is a suffering people, like ourselves not in the league. Would he play the Levite to Mexico and the Samaritan to Armenia?

Mr. POMERENE. When we have the Mexican question before the Senate I shall discuss it, and I shall discuss it from the humanitarian standpoint, but not from the standpoint of landed investors in Mexico.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator, if I may venture the reply, has not answered my question——

Mr. POMERENE. I think I have answered it.

Mr. McCORMICK. As to whether he would distinguish between our obligation toward Armenia, not toward the landed investors in Armenia, but the people, and our obligation toward Mexico, not toward landed investors in Mexico.

Mr. POMERENE. I would take it into consideration from the standpoint of the Mexican people and what would be for their good. I realize that it is a very knotty question, and it is one that ought to be settled in some way. However, I think I am about as well advised as my good friend from Illinois, and I shall be interested at the proper time to hear what his solution of it is.

Mr. President, if anyone shall make the motion to refer this entire subject of Armenia back to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a view to further consideration and presentation of some solution, I shall vote for that motion, and if no one else presents it and I have the opportunity, I shall present it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am moved to say a few words on the pending resolution, like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], who has just spoken so pointedly on this question, by the amendment tendered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], which operates as a declaration in favor of the acceptance of a mandate over Armenia. The Senator from Connecticut apprised us, at the time the amendment was tendered, that he did not propose to vote for it. It is offered, as he frankly states, for the purpose of putting some one in the hole. I am not bothered about that hole.

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut and for exactly the same reason that I shall vote against the resolution offered by the committee. I am not sufficiently advised at the present time either to vote for a general declaration against the acceptance of a mandate over Armenia or to vote for a general declaration in favor of accepting such a mandate.

I said I have not the information to enable me to form a mature judgment in reference to the matter. There are a vast multitude of people in this country, animated by the highest sentiments that characterize human nature, honorable in the last degree, who are urging that the United States accept a mandate over Armenia. They have a right to be heard before the Congress of the United States upon this very important question. They have a right to come before the Committee on Foreign Relations to urge such reasons as they can assign why this mandate ought to be accepted, and they ought to be permitted to assail and defeat it, if they can, the arguments that have been advanced against the acceptance of the mandate, and support their contention by such arguments as they can advance in support of them. This right has been denied them.

For instance, it is said that the Harbord report states, among other things, that a military force consisting of 59,000 men will be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the mandate, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is sponsor for a statement to the effect that by that same report an expenditure of $750,000,000 upon the part of the United States is contemplated. I shall have something to say about that in a little while.

But I pause to remark that when these people who are thus desirous that this country should exercise the mandate over Armenia come to be heard before a proper committee, they will easily establish that the Harbord report, to which reference has been made, contemplates a mandate over all of Turkey and not over Armenia only. A glance at the map indicates that Armenia, as it has been delimited by the treaties of peace and as it shall eventually be established by the arbitration that is to take place, constitutes but a small fractional part of the total area of Turkey in Asia.

This matter was referred to in an article contributed to the Baltimore Sun of last Sunday morning by a well-known correspondent, Mr. Stephen Bonsal, in which he said:

> While the President's urgent request to accept the Armenian mandate by the Senate has been denied by decisive vote, the Senators are holding forth upon the subject as though they feared the popular response to the President's request would be more favorable. The senatorial quivers are being filled with arguments, mostly drawn from the Harbord report. The information drawn from the report is misused. It is really misinformation, and a value is placed upon a misinterpretation of the important document which should only be accorded, if that, to a straight reading of it. I say that advisedly, for it must be borne in mind that the report is the work of men with little or no near eastern experience beyond the three weeks' time that the mission spent in or near the countries involved.
> To-day all the Senators who voted against doing anything for Armenia beyond a paper resolution of good cheer are telling their constituents that Harbord said that it would take 59,000 men and $84,000,000 to police and to finance Armenia for one year. As a matter of fact, those are the figures to cover responsibility and control in the whole Turkish Empire.
> I have been talking with an important member of the Harbord mission within the last few hours, and I may say it is the member whose knowledge of the actual local conditions is most generally admitted, and he tells me that while the separate report on a separate mandate for Armenia was never drawn up, the responsible members of the mission were nearly unanimous in believing that the first 12 months of responsibility would only require 10,000 men and $14,000,000 in money, and this financial calculation presupposes that Armenia would produce nothing in the way of revenue, which is, of course, an exaggeration of her present poverty-stricken condition.

Now, Mr. President, I can not see why the Foreign Relations Committee, instead of returning this resolution in this inconsiderately hurried matter, did not proceed to make inquiry in the usual and orderly way as to why this mandate should be granted, and particularly to find out just exactly what is meant by a "mandate." In the first place, I should like to be advised by proper testimony taken before the committee as to how far the other nations of the earth stand ready to carry out the obligations which they have assumed in adopting the League of Nations, under which they and each of them undertake to guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member of the league. Would they be willing to admit Armenia provisionally or assume a like obligation as to that country?

We are frightened with the specter of invasion of Armenia by soviet Russia as one of the reasons why this mandate should not be accepted; but, Mr. President, I would have you bear in mind that every nation of Europe of any consequence is already bound by the provisions of article 10 of the covenant to come to the aid of Armenia, if she is admitted as a member of the league, at least; and we might be able to secure their assurances beforehand of aid in that regard; or, at any rate, we could as a condition of our acceptance of any mandate over Armenia stipulate that those nations should become bound to assist in the defense of the country against foreign aggression as if Armenia were a member of the league.

Next, Mr. President, I should like to know how far it would be possible to recruit the necessary army in Armenia for the purpose of defense against either internal dissensions and uprisings or against foreign aggression. The nations that control colonies in distant parts of the earth find no difficulty whatever in raising from the people who are governed armies for necessary defense. That is the way Great Britain governs all of her colonies; not by men sent out from Great Britain and Ireland—she sends officers out—but the armies are all recruited from the native populations. Take India, for instance. I read from the Statesman's Year Book, at page 137, as follows:

> The Imperial service troops are raised and maintained by the native States and are trained under the supervision of British officers.

The same policy is pursued by Belgium. Belgium does not send a large army, for instance, to the Belgian Kongo in order to rule that country; she recruits her armies for the maintenance of order there from the native blacks. Germany did exactly the same with respect to her colonies in South Africa. France does the same thing in northern Africa, as is well known—in Tripoli and in Algiers. I should like to know why we would not be able to recruit the necessary men for such army as is necessary in Armenia from the Armenians themselves, and so to learn just exactly how many of our own people we should be obliged to send there, if any, in case we did undertake the mandate.

In the next place, I should like to understand just exactly how extensive is the demand from the Armenian people that we shall accept this mandate, because, unless the demand is practically unanimous among the Armenian people, at least so far as they are represented by the Armenian Government, I should not think for a moment of imposing any government of our choice upon them. Who is there here to-day who is able to tell us whether the Armenian people do want us to accept a mandate or do not want us to assume the obligation it implies?

Again, Mr. President, I should like to understand just exactly what revenue may be realized by proper taxes imposed upon the Armenian people in order to meet the expenses of the Government in that country should we undertake to administer it. I confess to a predilection—a strong predilection—in favor of this mandate, but I am not prepared to vote in favor of it now, for reasons which I have advanced, as well as those which I propose to give. I should like to know just exactly how much we can raise from taxes in Armenia in order to meet the expenditures that it will be necessary to make in the governing of that territory.

My own idea about the matter is that, poverty stricken as the country may be, we shall be able to raise by taxes levied upon those people, as taxes are levied in the Philippines, an amount of money that will amply take care of all the expenses of government there; and, Mr. President, that will be only a fraction of what has been wrung annually from those people for many centuries.

Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] told us how much it would cost to administer a mandate over Armenia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Although I agree with the Senator from Montana that our prospective duties as mandatory are utterly undefined, I had not supposed that one of them would be to levy and collect taxes from the Armenians. Does the Senator think that we, having recognized the Armenian Republic, should, under our duty as a mandatory, as the President has said, for the purpose of giving them advice and assistance, contemplate levying taxes upon them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The point I am endeavoring to make is that we have not yet been informed as to what powers we are to exercise under the mandate, and consequently what our corresponding obligations may be. I was about to say that I should want, before committing myself, to be advised as to the conditions of the mandate, which have not yet in any manner whatever been defined.

Let me remark that it is clearly contemplated in the covenant that a mandate over ignorant, black savages of South Africa shall be something essentially different from a mandate, for instance, over Poland or a mandate over Armenia. If we ever assume a mandate over a body of savage Indians, who are utterly incapable of self-government, we shall be obliged to exercise a dominion over them very much stronger and more extensive than we would over educated and refined people, who, we could confidently expect, would discharge to no small extent the task of government in their country.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not blame the Senator for wanting to know, of course; I am in the same boat myself; but I never contemplated in my most benevolent moments that my duty as guardian to assist these downtrodden people would be to lay taxes upon them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why? Taxes must be levied, either by us or by the native Government under our supervision. We exercise, in substance, a mandate over Haiti; we control the levy of their taxes and we direct as to how the public revenues shall be expended. It is clearly contemplated by the covenant that some similar supervising power shall be exercised over the Armenian Republic should it become the subject of a mandate, both with respect to the imposition of taxes and as to the manner in which the money shall be expended after it shall have been raised. But the point is that no one has yet undertaken to define what the mandate is which we are importuned on the one hand to accept and on the other to decline.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; and I for one shall not undertake to define it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator will not. I call your attention, Mr. President, to the fact that this proposal is opposed by all of the men who are opposed to the League of Nations under any circumstances and conditions whatever, and that the opposition comes from exactly the same source.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there was only one vote in favor of it in the whole Foreign Relations Committee. Four members of the committee voted against the resolution as framed to decline the mandate, but one of the four, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], desired to have more territory included in the mandate; he said he wanted a mandate to include all Turkey. That was his criticism of the project.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the table given in the Harbord report concerning expenditures on account of this proposal for five years has been inserted in the RECORD. Lest it may not already have been included, I shall read the paragraph preceding the table, as follows:

> The first duty of America is to its own people and its nearer neighbors.
> Our country would be involved in this adventure for at least a generation, and in counting the cost Congress must be prepared to advance some such sums less such amount—

Note the words "less such amount"— > as the Turkish and Transcaucasian revenues could afford for the first five years, as follows.

In other words, Mr. President, it was contemplated to take a mandate of all of Turkey in Asia, and if there was not raised in all that vast domain a single dollar for the support of the Government for a period of five years, then the expenses would be the amount to which your attention has been called, the amount to which the Senator from Wisconsin undertakes to assert the President must have intended the people of the United States should tax themselves for the purpose of establishing and maintaining orderly government in Armenia.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator know that the Turkish revenues could not be devoted to the payment of any part of the Armenian mandate except and unless Turkey were included in the mandate, and for that the President has not asked?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will follow me he will ascertain that I am calling attention to the fact that the Harbord report contemplates what the Senator suggests—not a mandate over Armenia as it is defined upon the map on the wall before us, but a mandate over the whole of Turkey and Transcaucasia.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct, but——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And in order to administer that mandate, without imposing any taxes whatever upon that great territory, it would require for five years $712,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS. But the President only asked for a mandate over Armenia.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly; and, accordingly, the suggestion made that it would cost this country to administer a mandate over Armenia for five years $712,000,000 is a misrepresentation of the plain facts.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think so, because Gen. Harbord declares that if we should confine the mandate to Armenia only it would be foredoomed to failure. He does not say exactly that, but I feel that is a fair conclusion from what he does say, and if we take a mandate over Armenia alone with the boundaries now ill-defined or undefined, in all probability it will cost more than for the mandate which Gen. Harbord had in contemplation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is entirely aside from the question, as the Senator must admit. I am not venturing an opinion as to whether a mandate over Armenia would be successful or unsuccessful; I have undertaken to show that the Harbord report tells us that if we assume a mandate over all of Turkey and Transcaucasia it is going to cost $712,000,000 for five years, provided not a dollar in taxation is exacted from the entire territory.

Mr. THOMAS. In all probability it will cost several times that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It may cost twenty times that amount; it may cost anything, of course. To suggest that that is what the Harbord report asserts we must pay in order to maintain a mandate in Armenia with its diminished territory as now indicated is without any foundation whatever in the evidence that is before us.

But, Mr. President, more than all these things, I should want to know, as I have indicated, just exactly what this mandate means. It does not signify anything at all to say that we are going to exercise a mandate over Armenia. We are exercising a mandate over Haiti, and, in a certain sense, we are exercising a mandate over Panama. The conditions in those cases are essentially different. One might be quite willing to accept a mandate such as we have over Panama, in which there is an American financial adviser with extensive powers, but quite unwilling to assume the responsibilities of such a mandate as we exercise over Haiti. In other words, we do not know what is expected of us under this mandate, nor can the Congress say by the mere use of the term "mandate" what duties it is called upon to assume or what obligations it will be required to discharge. But, Mr. President, if a hearing were given before the committee at which all interested parties might be heard, there are a lot of other arguments that have been advanced here upon the floor that I am very sure would be dissipated and overcome.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] this morning regaled us with an account of how the United States in its effort to supervise the government of Armenia and assist in the administration of affairs there as contemplated in article 22 of the covenant for a League of Nations would be obliged, in order to reach the seat of its operations, to go through the Mediterranean Sea, where its transports and the officers of our Government they carry on their way to administer affairs in Armenia would be subject to be intercepted by the British at Gibraltar or at Malta, by the French at Marseille, or by the Italians at some place along their peninsula. That is a mere elaboration of a possible objection to this mandate which is listed in the Harbord report. The Harbord report, I may say, has in one column arguments which support the contention in favor of the mandate in Armenia and in another column arguments which are advanced against it. It is not to be understood that the commission advances these arguments. It merely sets out the arguments that are made for and against the proposition. It says, by way of opposition:

> It would weaken and dissipate our strength which should be reserved for future responsibilities on the American continents and in the Far East. Our line of communication to Constantinople would be at the mercy of other naval powers, and especially of Great Britain, with Gibraltar and Malta, etc., on the route.

But, Mr. President, that does not disturb me at all, although apparently it is a thing that gives apprehension to distinguished Senators. Why, Mr. President, the little Kingdom of the Netherlands—according to my recollection, smaller in area than the State of Indiana—exercises a dominion over colonies in the East Indies of vast wealth and great fertility, the annual exports from which mount up into the hundreds of millions. In order to reach those colonies she is obliged to pass through the Mediterranean and the Suez Canal or to take the circuitous and dangerous route around the Cape of Good Hope. There she likewise encounters the power of Great Britain upon the seas; and yet, Mr. President, for 300 years Holland has easily exercised the necessary dominion over these colonies, and they are to-day prosperous under her care. What is the reason for imagining that we should be interrupted in our passage to and fro from Armenia any more than Holland is in passing from her home ports to those of her East Indian possessions?

Then it is suggested that there was other desirable territory in the immediate vicinity of Armenia which has been avariciously grabbed up by selfish European powers, Great Britain and France and others, leaving simply a barren and unproductive waste, now known as Armenia, which is generously tendered to the Government of the United States; and in that connection, Mr. President, we are regaled with much eloquence in denunciation of the unspeakable Turk, the conclusion to be drawn being that he is unworthy to hold dominion over any portion of God's earth; and yet when in the fullness of time his empire, long threatened with disintegration, falls away, we not only decline to assume the burden of governing any portion of the territory which was his, but abuse without restraint those who do.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] indulged in much eloquence in denunciation of the grasping nature of Great Britain with respect to the territory in question, and impliedly of our ancient ally and friend, France, as well. It would be interesting to know just what disposition he would propose of the dominions of Turkey in Asia. Would he permit the same unspeakable Turk to oppress them without interference as heretofore and would he advise that all nations act in like manner with reference to that question? The treaty of Berlin has been denounced here upon the floor this morning for continuing Turkey in possession of much territory which ought to have gone to Russia. Then why to-day object because other European powers, likely to be more considerate in their treatment of their subjects, have appropriated provisionally some portion of this territory instead of leaving it a prey to his tyranny and misrule?

But, Mr. President, I am not concerned that these other powers have appropriated, if the fact be that they have appropriated, the richest portion of the dominions of the Turk in Asia. We do not want any of their rich territory. We can not be induced to go into Asia or any other portion of the earth for the purpose of grabbing up rich territory. It is said that they have appropriated the producing oil fields of that section, leaving to us an undesirable section, which they graciously tender to us. It is a matter of no consequence to me whether they have or have not, but I should like to have the committee, if it ever undertakes to go into this matter, ascertain and determine the fact to see whether the suggestion is correct and sound that they have acted in this ungenerous manner toward the Government of the United States. It would not, however, make any difference with my decision in the matter, because I am not looking for rich and powerful countries to absorb. If we go into Armenia, we go in because we are desirous of doing something for those poor and afflicted people; and the more deeply they are sunk in poverty, the more powerful becomes the appeal to the people of this country. If it be true that they are not as rich nor their country as fertile as those of adjacent and surrounding countries, the appeal becomes all the stronger to the people of this country to help them out in their difficulties and in their trials.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying that I am not prepared to vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that we accept a mandate over Armenia; neither, sir, am I prepared to vote the other way—that we decline to accept a mandate upon any terms, under any conditions, and no matter what may be disclosed as to our liabilities and our responsibilities in the premises.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate at any great length on the pending concurrent resolution. I merely desire to make an explanation of the vote I intend to cast when the concurrent resolution comes before the Senate for final action.

I do not think this question can be separated from the matters to be determined in making a treaty of peace with Germany. I think that is the main question, and the question of peace must first be settled before we can reach a proper determination on matters such as those embraced in the pending concurrent resolution.

The issue is clearly defined in the country. A large number of the Members of the Senate and a great many people in the United States believe that the treaty of Versailles should be agreed to. On the other hand, there is very strong opposition against that position. Now, one of the great problems to be decided in determining that question—and it now must be determined by the country—is the question as to whether we shall become a part of the League of Nations. If we become signatory to the treaty of Versailles and become a part of the League of Nations, I assume that no man will deny the fact that this Government should accept all the responsibilities that go with that action. On the other hand, if the country fails to ratify the treaty of Versailles, it will do so on the basis that it intends to divorce itself entirely from European affairs and occupy an isolated place among the nations of the world, so far as the covenant of the league is concerned.

If the country takes the position that we should make a separate treaty of peace with Germany, or conclude peace in some other way, aside from the treaty of Versailles, then it seems to me apparent that there is no reason why we should become a mandatory of any country in the world except where our own personal interests are involved. On the other hand, if we ultimately become a part of the League of Nations, we shall then be compelled to accept what we determine to be our share of the responsibility under that covenant.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator for me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he does not believe that there are obligations resting upon the United States growing out of the war which it may not escape, even though it fails to become a member of the League of Nations?

For instance, if I may make my point a little clearer, I gave an illustration to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] when he was occupying the floor a few moments ago. Suppose that Germany—to change the form of the illustration—should witness a remarkable recrudescence of power and ambition, and make an assault upon Poland with a view to territorial annexation and aggrandizement. Notwithstanding the fact that we are not a member of the League of Nations and have not ratified the peace, so far as the treaty is concerned in connection with the other nations, does not the Senator think that the obligation would rest upon us to do our part to preserve Poland, and to that extent to cooperate with the League of Nations or the allied nations for the purpose of preserving her territorial integrity and repelling the assaults of Germany?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator from Utah that a nation that is as great and as powerful and as influential as our Nation, and our country, and our Government, can not escape its moral responsibility for the onward progress of civilization in the world, for the protection of the freedom of nations, and the upbuilding of the liberties of the peoples throughout the world. It is a responsibility which must rest on every great nation.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, so that I may not be misapprehended, I did not intend to predicate the action of the United States, which I assume it ought to take in the circumstances just indicated, upon our high position as a great world power, but I based it upon the fact that we had been in the war, and that we had said, indirectly if not directly, to those people who occupy lands carved out of the Central Empires, that we would aid them in organizing stable and independent Governments, and therefore that there was a moral obligation upon our part, if not a legal one, to aid them in the stabilization of the Government which they organized under the promise of the protection of the United States and the other nations.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to see our Government occupy the position of a knight errant, who is riding far afield to defend every cause of right or justice which we may, as we ride along, determine lies in our course.

I will say to the Senator that I voted for the unconditional ratification of the treaty of Versailles. So far as I am concerned, I have not changed by viewpoint. I think the treaty should have been ratified; I think now it should be ratified, not because I think it is a perfect instrument, but for the very reason which the Senator has named. We went into the war for many reasons, but that is an issue which is past and gone. We are coming out of the war, and the question as to how we are coming out must be decided in the conclusion of peace.

I think we do owe some obligations. I think we manifestly owe obligations to the other nations who were involved in the war with us, and to the downtrodden people of Europe; and I think there is but one way in which those obligations can be worked out, not by ourselves alone, not by occupying an isolated position, but by the assistance, aid, help, and concurrence of the great civilized nations of the world, and I think that can only be done through the process of ratifying a league of nations, agreeing to become a member of the League of Nations, and determining these questions by the force of the league, and not as an individual nation standing by itself.

We have far more respect for the verdict of a jury composed of 12 men than we have for the verdict of one man, as a rule, because in a sense the verdict of a jury composed of 12 men divorces the proposition further from the personal equation and from selfishness. I think the decision in reference to these great international affairs is more likely to be worked out without invading the domain of selfishness if we stand within a covenant of the League of Nations, and it is the united opinion of the great nations of the world, than to have one single nation attempt to solve the problem by itself.

Therefore I feel that the question of a mandatory for Armenia is not a question which should be decided either way until the leading proposition is determined, and that is as to whether peace is going to be made by the ratification of the treaty of Versailles or whether a separate treaty of peace is going to be made with Germany. When that is determined and that is settled, then I am willing to consider the question as to whether or not we should assist in establishing a permanent and stable government in Armenia, and I think it is manifestly clear that we should not act until that time comes.

In the first place, if we act in conjunction with the other great nations of the world we will probably be able to maintain our position without conflicts and without arms, whereas if we stand alone, as one nation, outside of the league, and attempt to determine the future policies of a country lying right in the hotbed of the earth's turmoil, we may become involved in very serious difficulties.

I realize that this question was not brought before the Senate or brought before the country by our action. It came here because the signatory powers to the League of Nations invited this country to occupy the position as a mandatory for Armenia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A mandate in Armenia for all the civilized nations of the world, to act as their agent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is correct. This leads me to the very point I was coming to. If we are ultimately in the League of Nations, a part of the organization, we will have a voice in the determination of how far the mandatory shall be exercised, what its powers and duties shall be, when it shall be enforced, when it shall be recalled. But if we accept the mandatory and are not in the League of Nations, then we accept it under the power of the governing board of other nations in whose counsels we have no part.

The life of a nation runs through centuries. The problems which confront them are not like the problems of every-day life which must be determined on the instant. The decision that is reached in this matter may reflect itself beyond the life of even the nations which exist to-day. There is no need for haste. We had better be sure we are right, and that we stand on sound ground fundamentally, before we act, and the question as to whether we pass this decision by this week or this month or this year is not nearly as important as is the question of determining it aright.

I think that within the course of the next year, when the turmoil on the political battle fields of the country has ceased, when the storm clouds have cleared away, the Senate of the United States will reach a final conclusion as to how and in what manner we are going to conclude our part of the peace of the world. But until that time comes, in my judgment, it is manifest that we can not properly decide the question which is now before the Senate.

I think the resolution should be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to hold it there until a treaty of peace is concluded with Germany, regardless of how the treaty of peace is concluded. If it is concluded by the ratification of the treaty of Versailles, then we will approach the question of the consideration of a mandate from that standpoint. On the other hand, if peace with Germany is concluded by a separate peace in some way, then we will approach the consideration of that question from another standpoint.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Would the Senator send no answer of any sort to the Executive as to the attitude of Congress at this time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the answer I am proposing is just as strong and just as clear an answer as that which has been proposed in the pending resolution. It is that the Senate of the United States is not prepared to reach a decision on this question, on either side of it, until the conclusion of the world peace, so far as we are concerned. I think it is just as logical an answer, just as fair an answer, and one which will be just as fully understood.

If we are going to divorce ourselves entirely from the affairs of the world we might well say, Why should we become involved in Armenia, any more than we should become involved in Mexico, or any other country of the world? On the other hand, if we ratify the treaty of Versailles we must live up to the obligations we take upon ourselves as a Nation.

I have never been one who has denied that if the treaty of Versailles is ratified we assume great obligations which we must be responsible for. But that is the issue. We assume those obligations for the purpose of attempting to preserve the peace of the world. If we do not accomplish that result by assuming the obligations, or at least take a step which will ultimately lead to the preservation of the peace of the world, then we are making a mistake.

I believe we will take that step. I know the heart pangs that were beating in the breasts of millions of people, loyal to their flag, two years ago. I have not forgotten them. I know that if this great Nation refuses to take its position in the eyes of the world for the peace of the world, for the freedom of the world, and for the liberties of the people of the world, that back we will go to barbarism; oh, it may not be barbarism in our daily lives, in our manner of life, but back to barbarism so far as the great ideals of the world are concerned, so far as preserving governments of law, so far as preserving international justice, so far as giving the weaker nations of the world an opportunity to live their own lives and pursue their own ideals.

As far as I am concerned, I am willing to take my responsibility. I think no man is worthy of the name of man who is not willing to take his responsibility and stand true to it in his family and in his neighborhood and in his State. I say that the same principle which applies to man applies to nations, and that no country is worthy of the name of a great nation that will shirk its responsibility in the life of nations, that is unwilling to pay the price, if you wish to call it that, in order that it may preserve and stand at the forefront in the progress of civilization.

Therefore, I stand for the unconditional ratification of the treaty of Versailles, and if it can not be unconditionally ratified then I hope that action may be taken that will not indicate that this Government of ours is going to deny its final responsibility in the family of the nations of the world.

But I do say, as far as the pending resolution is concerned, that I do not believe this is the time or the place for its determination. I think it would be equally as inopportune at this time to agree to become a mandate in Armenia as it would to reject it, to refuse to take any position in the matter. We are not prepared to act affirmatively. You may talk about reports before the Senate as to the military necessity and the military power that is needed, but I feel that I can say confidently that the Senate itself has not done its full duty, has not investigated the many details, and has not grasped the responsibilities that flow from this action.

On the other hand, I am not prepared to say that I will vote to reject this mandate and say to the nations of the world that we wash our hands of this man's blood, that we take no responsibility in this matter. This is a great Christian Nation and a great Christian people, and for generations back the throb of our national life has been against the barbarism of the Turk exercised over a Christian people. I am not prepared to say from my vote that I reject the thought, the sentiment, and the position of the people of America during the last five decades in that matter.

If that is the case, why should we act now? We have no right to captiously throw this great problem aside. We have no right to act now, because we are not prepared to act. If that is the correct conclusion, then I say there is but one action that the Senate can consistently take, and that is to refer the resolution back to the committee and let it stay there until the real problem, the foremost problem involved, the problem of determining peace, is first solved, and then we will solve the issues growing out of peace.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as one who has persistently and consistently and insistently voted for a League of Nations, I feel it incumbent upon me to express in almost a single sentence the reason why I can neither support by my vote the amendment to this resolution nor agree to any mandate over Armenia under present conditions.

Mr. President, a few years ago there was created The Hague tribunal. It was hoped that this tribunal might accomplish something for the prevention of future great wars. I, for one, had little faith in its potency. I knew and pointed out at the time what I considered its weakness, namely, that no one of the great nations bound itself to submit its questions of international difficulties to that tribunal. The provision was simply that they might submit their differences, and even that was hedged about with a further proviso that no nation should be required to submit matters touching its sovereignty, its national honor, or its vital interests—and vital interests, of course, could be expanded to cover any possible question in which there might be an international dispute. That was the weakness of The Hague tribunal—no nation agreed or bound itself to submit its disputes to this court.

Now, what did we need to preserve the peace of the world? A simple agreement entered into between all the great nations of the world, to and with each other, that it would make no war of conquest upon its neighbor, that it would rob no other country of its territory, that it would not destroy the political independence of any other country. With an agreement of that kind, signed by all the great nations in the world, such a war as has lately devastated the earth never would have happened.

All I have hoped for is that we might secure such an agreement. We did not need to exercise mandates or half-sovereign powers over other nations in order to secure that result; but once we sign an agreement whereby we submit to some board or council every question touching international controversies for investigation and report to the peoples of the two countries and the world, so that the world may understand, as well as the people and the countries engaged in the quarrel may comprehend what the real difference is, we can depend upon the sense of justice and of enlightenment of the people of the world to prevent any great war.

After having refused to enter into a compact with the other great nations of the world, and after this country had stated that this country would join no other country on the face of the earth to protect the peace of the world, we are now asked to exercise a mandate over a portion of Asia. I have never been in sympathy at all with these resolutions that have from time to time passed the Senate either in favor of some particular nation as against another or censuring some other nation for its conduct. If we want to control the conduct of another nation, then let us enter into a combination with the nations of the world where we can discuss with that nation its domestic or international difficulties. If we do not want to do so, and do our part in maintaining the peace of the world, then let us keep our hands off, and where we find a condition so delicate that we must keep our hands off of it, I think we should keep our resolutions out of it.

After spurning the invitation to enter into European politics in combination with the balance of the world for world preservation, I am opposed to our sneaking in through the back door to exercise our influence over a portion of Europe or Asia. Either go in whole-heartedly and with an honest purpose to preserve the peace of the world in conjunction with the other great nations or keep out entirely. We have passed Armenian resolutions and Irish resolutions and anti-Turkish resolutions, and what have they all amounted to? The other countries of the world know what we mean. They know we are merely playing politics. I do not believe in pointing a gun that is simply loaded with political hot air, and especially where the country against which it is aimed knows the character of the charge, and that is really what we are doing in most of these resolutions of sympathy or advice.

If we want to help Ireland, if we want to help Armenia, if we want to help Egypt, then join with either one of two things. Join with the other nations of the world to see that justice is done to all of these smaller nations, or else be ready to back up our resolution with war if necessary in defense of justice for any small nation in the world.

So my policy, Mr. President, is either to go in with the other great nations of the earth to preserve the peace of the world, or, if we are to adopt a policy of isolation, then let us stay at home and attend to our own business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I move that the pending resolution and all amendments thereto be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with instructions to report back to the Senate after the ratification of a peace treaty with the Central Powers.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, in view of the importance of the Senator's motion, let me interrupt him to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Henderson	Norris	Thomas
Colt	Hitchcock	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Dial	Kenyon	Page	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Knox	Ransdell	Warren
Fall	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Fernald	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
France	McCormick	Shields	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Simmons
Gay	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.
Gerry	McLean	Smith, Ga.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have been led to move to recommit the pending resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations largely because of reasons stated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If that motion does not prevail, I shall then as soon as possible offer the amendment of which I have heretofore spoken.

The Senator from Montana has called attention to the fact that, although the Armenian mandate involves a matter of tremendous importance, and although public opinion in the United States is known to be somewhat divided, but very earnest in the main in the desire to bring some relief to Armenia, the committee did not allow any time for hearings and made no investigation whatever on the subject, in order either to ascertain public opinion in the United States or to ascertain what a mandate, in the circumstance, means. The President has asked us for authority to take a mandate over Armenia. He has not defined what he means by a mandate. The committee could have taken opportunity to ascertain that fact and could have informed itself of the powers the President contemplated to exercise under a mandate. Instead of doing that and instead of giving the friends of Armenia in the United States an opportunity to come before the committee and to present in a concrete form the nature of the assistance which they desired the United States to extend, the committee, after one of the briefest sessions in its history, reported the pending resolution, proposing to deny to the President the acceptance of a mandate in Armenia.

It has been assumed generally that what the President meant was the right and authority to use the armed forces of the United States to maintain government there; but it would have been quite within the jurisdiction of the committee to have reported in favor of granting, as it would be quite within the jurisdiction of Congress to grant, a mandate to the President that would be far short of such an extreme use of power. No attempt, however, was made by the committee, and in the short time allowed no attempt was possible, to formulate any plan under which the President might use the moral forces of the United States and the official sanction of the Government of the United States in giving protection to this little Republic, which is composed of people who have appealed in such an extreme degree to the sympathies of the United States.

It seems to me that the committee should have held hearings; that it should have investigated the character, extent, and limitations of a mandate; that it should have done something to bring before the Senate information on the subject; that it should have even made an effort to ascertain the attitude of Armenia toward such a request, because it has been asserted here on the floor that we have no knowledge that the exercise of such a mandate would be agreeable to Armenia; but nothing of that sort was attempted. Instead, the committee has reported out this resolution, which is a peremptory refusal to give the President any power involved in the possible exercise of a mandate.

Mr. President, I have endeavored to meet that situation, because I think it is serious. I think the adoption of such a resolution would be an immense damage to the cause of self-government in Armenia. It would be a notice to Armenia that the United States does not sympathize with the President in his desire to help that country; it would be a notification to Turkey and to the Turkish people that they can continue their persecutions of the Armenian Christians without any likelihood that the United States will do anything to bring relief. So I have proposed—and I shall offer, if necessary—my amendment to create a mixed commission of Americans and Armenians to supervise the issuance and sale in the United States of $50,000,000 of bonds, the money to be used for the purpose of economic rehabilitation in Armenia and for the establishment of a sound banking and currency system there.

I drew that amendment because I had been told by Armenians and by their close friends in this country that Armenia, most of all, wants such economic aid from the United States at this time. I drew it because I believe that such bonds, if issued under the sanction of government to secure their regularity and the honest disposition of the funds, would find a market in this country and enable the people of Armenia to rehabilitate their country and resume the practice of agriculture, which, I understand, is very profitable there, and also enable them to restore their damaged railroad and other facilities. But after counsel with the Senator from Alabama, and after listening to the Senator from Montana, it has occurred to me that there are probably Senators on the other side of the Chamber, as I know there are Senators on this side of the Chamber, who hesitate to vote on this important question without a more careful investigation of it.

Why, Mr. President, the committees of the Senate devote days and weeks to investigations for the benefit of the Senate in connection with questions of infinitely small importance compared with this great question. Here we have thrown into the Senate at this time the great issue of authorizing the President to accept a mandate over Armenia, without any knowledge of what a mandate means, without any investigation as to whether a mandate would be agreeable to Armenia, without any showing as to the limitations of the mandate; and it seems to me that as reasonable men and as conscientious supporters of the idea of sympathy with Armenia we ought to refer this question back to the committee with instructions to investigate the matter and report to the Senate at a time which is proper, which I have named here as after the ratification of the peace treaties with the Central Powers.

It may seem to many that the ratification of those peace treaties is in the extreme future. I do not believe it. It seems to me that the stupendous importance of the question, the tremendous issues that wait upon the decision, will lead this country to ratify some treaty with the Central Powers at a time when this resolution can come out naturally and properly as a part of the perfecting act.

I therefore move, Mr. President, that the pending concurrent resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations with instructions to report at that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am somewhat notorious, I believe, in this body, and have been in the other, for doing teamwork; and therefore when I contemplate casting a vote that will be in clash with the recommendations of the minority leader and the senior Democratic member of the Foreign Relations Committee it is due to myself that I should make some explanation of it.

Mr. President, if this resolution is sent back to the Committee on Foreign Relations, it will lie there until the first Monday in December; and that is the object of the motion as well as the effect of making it, because we all know that we are going to adjourn very soon until that date, and that the committee will not have time to report nor the Senate to act before our adjournment.

Mr. President, it is out of all reason, it is out of all courtesy, it is out of all comity of nations, that the United States should receive, through its Executive, from the great civilized powers of the world an international invitation and deliberately send it to a committee to sleep "until after the conventions." That will not do. We can not afford to take that position in the eyes of the world. We have played a good deal of politics, but that is carrying it too far. The civilized world, through the President of the United States, requests the United States to accept a mandate in Armenia for the League of Nations, for that is what it is, and the nations party to the league are behind it. Instead of returning a reply, "We will" or "We will not," we pass a resolution upon the floor of the Senate to recommit to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the effect of holding it over until the first Monday in December, while in the meanwhile all Europe is seething and France and Italy and Great Britain and the Armenians themselves are awaiting a reply, and we, forsooth, can not make it; we, forsooth, at least will not make it.

Talk about not having the facts upon which to proceed and not knowing what a mandate means! The language of the covenant tells what a mandate means; it means taking over as trustees for the League of Nations the task of "advising and assisting" the country in question until it can stand alone. All of that language is in the covenant. Now, let us not shirk this. We have shirked a plenty of things—enough of that; let us meet it. If America is going to measure itself up to its obligations and its burdens, then let us here and now measure ourselves up to them. If we are not going to measure up, let us say so, and let us not commit the great discourtesy—to express it in the most charitable terms—of asking the whole world to wait on us until the 1st of December next, while we may think and hold conventions and play politics. The world takes for granted that as Members of the most august deliberative body in the world, and all that, we Senators have already thought about great international questions like this.

I therefore am opposed to sending this resolution back to the committee, if for no other reason than because it is, in the first place, a discourtesy to the President on our part, and, in the second place, a discourtesy to the civilized powers of the world upon our country's part.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] spoke without recollection, perhaps, when he said that there had been no hearings whatever in the Foreign Relations Committee. There was a special committee appointed upon this question of Armenia. They held many sessions. They considered the resolution very elaborately. They had hearings, which are printed, and they reported a resolution, which was subsequently passed by the Senate. When we took up the matter in the committee no one at that moment recollected how important it was to hear the President or how important it was to know what he meant by the word "mandate." The committee at that stage thought they knew what was meant by a mandate. There was no suggestion of taking evidence. We have more evidence in the Harbord report than could be collected by the Senate in a year.

Mr. President, of course the object of the motion to recommit is obvious enough, and the great objection to it has been stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. The President has asked a most important authority. He has asked it at the request of the allied and associated powers. They wish to know what we mean to do about Armenia. The President has a right to know, the country has a right to know, and Europe has a right to know what our decision is to be. This is not a question that can be met by evading a vote, which simply means that the resolution will sleep untouched in the Foreign Relations Committee for a long time at least.

We are on the eve of adjournment. The only proper thing to do now is to deal with this question and answer it, one way or the other, as the Senate thinks best. I do not believe myself that there is the slightest doubt in the mind of any Senator at this moment as to his own views about the mandate and what a mandate may imply, what a mandate necessarily must imply. It has been discussed at the greatest possible length in the Harbord report on the very basis of a mandate; and I trust, whatever the Senate does, whether it votes for the resolution reported by the committee or whether it votes against it, that at least it will not, for the purpose of avoiding a decision—and there is nothing else in it—vote to recommit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to recommit with instructions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. For the present I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. COMER] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent on account of sickness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent this afternoon, and I have agreed to take care of him with a pair. I find that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. GAY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Kendrick	Pomerene	Stanley
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Ransdell	Trammell
Dial	King	Robinson	Underwood
Gay	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Myers	Simmons	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Harrison	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Henderson	Phelan	Smith, Md.

NAYS—43.

Ball	Fernald	McCumber	Smoot

Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	La Follette	Sherman
Fletcher	Johnson, S. Dak.	Moses	Swanson
Glass	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry

So the Senate refused to recommit the concurrent resolution with instructions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "respectfully declines to grant" and insert the word "grants," so that if amended the resolution will read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress hereby grants to the Executive the power to accept the mandate over Armenia, as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, the hour of 4 o'clock not having arrived yet, is it in order to make any remarks at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 10 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not want to take 10 minutes, Mr. President, but I do wish to say, on this particular amendment to the resolution, that I understand from its author the purpose of it, which is, as already stated, to put somebody in a political hole in this matter.

I am not in favor of a mandate for all it means right now. I expressed to the committee, as some of the members will remember, that I lacked information. I was quite modest in that statement, knowing the Senatorial desire and expectation that whatever they did not already know they would acquire in a few minutes from some of their colleagues. Placed in this attitude, and with the statement that I have made, I would not have the Government say to the world that this great Nation has forgotten what I conceive to be its obligations; I would not have it say to the Turk to invade Armenia when he pleases; I would not have it say to that disturbed portion of the world that the United States, no matter how much blood is spilled, has little care so long as it fills its coffers with the coin. That will be considered demagogic; it is sentimental with me; and I shall, on this amendment, offered for the avowed purpose for which it has been offered, vote against it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah offers the following as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into arrangements with the allied powers, either through the supreme allied council, or the council of the League of Nations, to cooperate on behalf of the United States with said powers, or the members of the League of Nations, for the proper protection of Armenia, including the advancement of supplies and commodities essential for the health and life of its people, and the preservation of its political independence and territorial integrity.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I make the point of order that an amendment is open to amendment, but that that is not an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order yet.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. My understanding was that the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut was offered as a substitute for the pending resolution, and therefore that an amendment in the nature of a substitute was within the rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My amendment is to strike out certain words and insert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is perfectly plain. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut is in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is the pending amendment, and is to strike out and insert certain words.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Utah will be in order after the original resolution is perfected.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and I intend to vote for the committee amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I think we should be in a League of Nations before we begin to consider taking mandates over foreign countries. I am in favor of our being in the League of Nations. I have voted to ratify the peace treaty and League of Nations with reservations and without reservations. I hope we may enter the League of Nations on proper conditions, and after that I might be in favor of our taking a mandate over Armenia, with whose people I sympathize. I do not say that I would, but I think I would probably look upon it with favor. However, until we do get into the League of Nations, I do not think we should be accepting mandates over foreign countries nor getting into foreign matters and complications which the League of Nations is supposed to handle and control and which, in my opinion, can only be handled properly by concerted action of the leading nations of the earth—in other words, by the League of Nations.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Vice President has handed to me, as one of the Senators from California, a telegram addressed to the Senate of the United States from the Sacramento Church Federation. The right of petition, of course, can not be denied, and it has been the practice of the Chair to send to Senators resolutions and petitions originating in their States, and to give nothing from the desk, as I understand it, which does not proceed from some public body. I therefore will read the telegram:

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., May 26, 1920.

The UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.:

Sacramento Church Federation, representing thousands Sacramento Protestants, most earnestly petition you to carefully consider moral effect of any refusal to accept the mandate for Armenia. This is one of the great moral opportunities of all history. If America fails here, the blot upon her escutcheon can never be removed.

SACRAMENTO CHURCH FEDERATION.

I voted for recommitment, Mr. President, because I think it is a question which should be solved by careful consideration of our duty in the premises, and with the view of securing the cooperation of the powers who have partitioned among themselves the productive lands of Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Syria, and who, by this device, I think, are imposing upon the good nature of the United States by allocating a mandate over a country which in itself is not self-supporting. I can conceive some arrangement by which those rich countries may, by development, become so resourceful that they will support their own governments, under the wise direction of a mandate, exercised not by one country alone but by several countries sharing the responsibility and the direction.

Therefore I am not prepared to reject the request of the President, and yet I do not consider that a mandate without qualifications would be a wise movement at this time. I regret that the matter has not been recommitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed to vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On lines 2 and 3 of the concurrent resolution it is proposed to strike out the words "respectfully declines to grant" and insert the single word "grants," so that it will read:

That the Congress hereby grants to the Executive the power to accept a mandate over Armenia, as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has requested the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair that I made on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. The junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] has a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. By agreement I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] and I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made upon the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAY. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent on official business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Again announcing my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Ashurst	McKellar	Robinson	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Phelan	Sheppard	Smith, S. C.
King	Ransdell	Simmons	Williams

NAYS—62.

Ball	Gay	McLean	Smoot
Borah	Gerry	McNary	Spencer
Brandegee	Hale	Myers	Stanley

Elkins	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Fall	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Fernald	Lodge	Shields	Wolcott
France	McCormick	Smith, Ga.
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Smith, Md.

NOT VOTING—22.

Comer	Gronna	Kirby	Penrose
Culberson	Hitchcock	La Follette	Sherman
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Swanson
Fletcher	Johnson, S. Dak.	Newberry	Warren
Glass	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman
Gore	Kellogg	Owen

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the pending resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the concurrent resolution add the following:

Resolved further, That the President be, and he is hereby, empowered to appoint three American citizens to act with a like number of representatives of the Government of Armenia in the organization of a joint commission, the six so chosen to select a seventh person as chairman. Said joint commission shall be charged with the duty of supervising the preparation, issuance, offering for sale, and sale in the United States of bonds of the Armenian Government, not exceeding $50,000,000 in amount, the proceeds of which shall be available under approval of the commission for the following purposes, to wit: To purchase in the United States agricultural implements, materials for railroad development, construction, and repair in Armenia, and other similar supplies for economic development and rehabilitation that may be designated by the Armenian Government: Provided, That not to exceed one-half of this amount may be used for the purpose of rehabilitating and establishing a sound banking and currency system for Armenia, in case the Armenian Government may so decide, under the advice and approval of this joint commission. These bonds may be made payable in the United States, but the Government of the United States is not to be made in any sense responsible for the payment of either principal or interest.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. I make the point of order that this is a concurrent resolution, and under the practice of the two Houses a concurrent resolution does not go to the President and never carries legislation. The concurrent resolution now before us carries no legislation and does not go to the President. The proposed amendment clearly is legislation requiring the assent of the President, and therefore would not be in order on a resolution which does not go to the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not think the position the Senator from Massachusetts has taken in reference to the proposed amendment is correct. The Senate may have a concurrent resolution before it, and what the Senator says may be true, that there is language in the amendment that would require the action of the President to carry it into effect. It seems to me that while that may be an argument against the adoption of the amendment it clearly does not make it subject to a point of order. I know of no rule which would prevent the Senate as a body from changing a concurrent resolution into a joint resolution if it desires to do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. By amendment or otherwise. Suppose that during the consideration of the pending concurrent resolution the Senate in its wisdom should reach the conclusion that it was a proposal that had better go to the President and have the sanction of the President, would it not be in order to strike out the word "concur" in the resolving clause and insert words that would make it a joint resolution instead of a concurrent resolution? It seems to me manifestly that would be true. If we amend the resolving clause so as to change the form of the resolution, clearly we could put in an amendment that might have the effect of requiring the action of the President to carry it into effect, because is the Chair to assume that the Senate, in its wisdom, at a later time may not amend the resolving clause?

I think the Senator from Massachusetts might possibly advance his argument as a reason against the adoption of the amendment if he desires to do so, but it seems to me clear that it does not go to the question of order. The rules of the Senate are made for the orderly transaction of business, and it appears to me that any rule which is interpreted to prevent the reflection of the views of the Senate into the pending resolution or into a bill is against the spirit of this body, the spirit of the times, when it is not necessary for the orderly conduct of business. Surely there is nothing in the proposed amendment that goes further than to reflect the will and the wish of the Senate, if it is agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to make a remark about the question of order raised by the Senator from Massachusetts. Of course, it is true, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggests, that it is perfectly within the power of the Senate to amend the title of the pending resolution by changing it from a concurrent to a joint resolution. If the Senate shall desire to make that change and then it is proposed as a joint resolution, of course it is amendable. The point of order made by the Senator from Massachusetts is that, inasmuch as the pending resolution is a concurrent resolution, not requiring the signature of the President, and being in its essence simply a reply by Congress to a question put by a coordinate department of the Government, it would be out of order to impose legislation upon it, which would require the signature of the President.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield for a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. My view of the Constitution is that every order, resolution, or vote in which the concurrence of the House and Senate may be necessary must be presented to the President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is not a question.

Mr. ASHURST. On what does the Senator base the suggestion that a concurrent resolution need not be presented to the President?

Mr. LODGE. It is the universal practice not to do so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as I said, this is simply the answer of Congress to an inquiry addressed to Congress by the executive branch of the Government, involving no legislation, but inquiring whether we will grant the President power to accept a mandate to which it is now proposed to affix a piece of legislation authorizing a general international commission to set up a currency system in Armenia, which does not seem to me to be very closely germane to the inquiry which was made by the President, which can be affirmatively answered by a concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is aware of the fact that there have been a great many opinions expressed as to what resolutions under the Constitution should properly go to the President, and what should not go to him. If any Senator can present to the Chair an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States to the effect that a concurrent resolution need not go to the President, the Chair will be glad to be guided by it. So far as the Chair is aware, no such decision of the Supreme Court of the United States has ever been rendered; certainly none has ever been cited to the Chair. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is in order, and overrules the point of order which has been made against it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. HITCHCOCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair which I made on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in reference to my pair and its transfer as I previously made, I vote "nay."

Mr. GAY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in reference to my pair as on the previous vote and not being able to get a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair and its transfer as I previously made, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Reiterating the announcement made by me on the last roll call in reference to my pair and its transfer, I wish to be recorded as voting "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Kendrick	Ransdell	Thomas
Beckham	Kenyon	Robinson	Townsend

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the President of the United States is authorized to render administrative advice and assistance to Armenia, and for such purposes he is empowered to appoint and employ such agencies as he may consider necessary: Provided, That such assistance shall not extend to nor include military assistance, nor shall said authority permit the use of the Army and the Navy for the protection of the territorial integrity or the political independence of Armenia without further act of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I offer an amendment as a substitute for the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into arrangements, subject to the approval of Congress, with the allied powers, either through the supreme allied council or the council of the League of Nations, or otherwise, to cooperate on behalf of the United States with said powers, or the members of the League of Nations, for the proper protection of Armenia, including the advancement of supplies and commodities essential for the health and life of its people and the preservation of its political independence and territorial integrity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair and its transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as previously, I vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Once more repeating the announcement made upon the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GAY. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. OVERMAN. Making the same announcement that I made on the previous vote regarding my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Ashurst	Henderson	Pomerene	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Kendrick	Ransdell	Stanley
Chamberlain	King	Robinson	Trammell

So Mr. KING's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the original resolution.

Mr. REED and Mr. THOMAS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to a transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SPENCER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the explanation given upon the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the absence on important business of the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The result was announced—yeas 52, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—52.

So concurrent resolution No. 27, as reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress hereby respectfully declines to grant to the Executive the power to accept a mandate over Armenia as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The following resolutions, unanimously passed by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, were ordered sent to you with the request that they be given consideration when the question of the mandate for Armenia is taken up:

"'Whereas the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America has had brought to its attention the serious condition now developing in the Near East which menaces the peace of the world; and

"'Whereas America's delay in signing the peace treaty and entering the League of Nations is a contributing factor in these conditions: Therefore be it

"'Resolved, That we urge upon our Government the necessity of immediate affirmative action which will permit America to join the League of Nations with such reservations as righteousness requires, for the following reasons:

"'First. That America may bear her share of the responsibility in bringing to an end the suffering and wrong that still continues within the borders of these eastern countries.

"'Second. That America's prestige as a nation, which stands for open diplomacy and the rights of smaller nations, may be preserved.

"'Third. That the charge that America is failing to keep faith with the Allies be disproved.

"'Fourth. That the tendency now manifest among the nations to abandon the high ideals embodied in the League of Nations and to return to the methods of force and selfishness be checked.

"'Fifth. That America may take advantage of the opportunity providentially thrust upon her to aid in establishing peace of the world that righteousness which alone can exalt a nation.

"'Secondly. That in regard to America assuming responsibility for securing a stable government in the Near East, and especially in Armenia, which matter is now before Congress, we urge that our Government approach this question not from the viewpoint of political expediency, self-interest, or past tradition, but from the viewpoint of the service which our peculiar position makes possible. We call attention to the fact that the purpose which led America into the war was not fulfilled with the cessation of hostilities, and that the statement that "the war will not be over until the eastern question has been disposed of, and disposed of rightly," is becoming increasingly evident, for this reason: The assembly, while recognizing the widely diverse opinions held on this subject and the exceedingly delicate questions involved, heartily indorsed the action of the Federal Council of the Churches in America, as follows:

"'First. That it is well-nigh, if not actually, impossible for Great Britain and France to meet their present responsibilities, which can not be avoided, and much more to assume new ones without America's aid.

"'That cable dispatches from Lord Bryce and other British leaders interested in the Christian peoples of the Near East declare that unless America joins to help bear the burdens we see no hope of delivering the subject races of Turkey.

"'That the King-Crane, the Harbord, the Near East Relief, and other commissions, public and private, as well as a large number of Americans in the Near East, all agree that America alone is in a position to do with comparative ease what ought to be done in that country for its pacification, for the protecting of the people there, and for the setting up of a safe and righteous government.

"'"We therefore appeal to the Government at Washington to recognize America's peculiar opportunity and obligation to help in the solution of this problem, because she, better than any other nation, can take up its consideration with nothing to gain for herself, that without arousing suspicion in others, and in answer to the practically unanimous call of all the nations concerned, especially those smaller nations that are now awaking to a desire for national independence.

"'"We believe that we express the opinion of the large majority of those whom we represent when we say that the Christian people of our country are not coveting for America the responsibility of an advisory or mandatory position, feel that she should not shrink from declaring her willingness to take such an advisory or mandatory responsibility if the allied nations and the peoples of the east should make strong representation that by doing so she could effectively aid them in bringing order out of the chaotic conditions that now exist."

"'Thirdly.

"'Resolved further, That we urge America to take this more intimate part in eastern affairs, so that the peaceful work of missions may continue to render its helping hand, and that those now in exile from Armenia and Persia may return to their homes and the pursuit of their ordinary vocations unmolested.

"'Fourth. That copies of these resolutions signed by the moderator be sent to the President and to our Representatives in Washington, and that they be printed and put into the hands of all ministers in the Presbyterian Church, with a request that they use them as may seem wise, either by presenting to their congregations or to mass meetings or in approaching their Representatives in Congress.

"'That the expense of printing and distributing these resolutions be met by the assembly.'

"SAMUEL S. PALMER, Moderator."

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, praying for the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany with suitable reservations, and the acceptance by the United States of the mandate over Armenia, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., expressing sympathy for the people of Korea and urging the United States to amicably adjust relations between Japan and Korea, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of Shawnee County Pomona Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Wakarusa, Kans., and a memorial of Claypool Grange, No. 1770, Patrons of Husbandry, of Whitewater, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Nolan land tax bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. From the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 3390) to provide for the national defense; to establish a self-sustaining Federal agency for the manufacture, production, and development of the products of atmospheric nitrogen for military, experimental, and other purposes; to provide research laboratories and experimental plants for the development of fixed-nitrogen production; and for other purposes.

I ask permission to file a report on the bill later in the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. BALL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia; to define the duties of the Superintendent of Weights, Measures, and Markets of the District of Columbia; and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 647) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1024) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to John Zimmerman for certain lands in the Colorado National Forest upon the surrender of other lands of an equal acreage also located in the Colorado National Forest, Colo., reported it without amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12502) providing for a report on the cost of improving and maintaining the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4476) to consolidate certain forest lands within the Fishlake National Forest, in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 4477) to incorporate Armenian Relief; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CONDITIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. FRANCE. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 208) requesting the President of the United States to consider the advisability to proceed to suppress domestic violence and prevent the outbreak of organized armed civil conflict in West Virginia was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THOMAS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $192,278.83 to pay to the agency of the Canadian Car Foundry Co. (Ltd.), as a refund on import duties paid on certain materials to be manufactured in the United States for shipment abroad, but which were destroyed by fire, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA.

Mr. KING. I submit a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 29) was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to enter into arrangements with the allied powers, either through the supreme allied council or the council of the League of Nations, to cooperate on behalf of the United States with said powers or the members of the League of Nations for the proper protection of Armenia, including the advancement of supplies and commodities essential for the health and life of its people and the preservation of its political independence and territorial integrity.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATION OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. FRANCE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 378), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas there is evidence to indicate that some of the funds appropriated by the Congress for the use by the Department of Justice in upholding the Constitution of the United States and the Federal statutes are being employed by the Department of Justice in such a manner as to cause an increase of lawlessness, disorder, and resort to violence, and in open defiance by the Department of Justice of the statutes and of the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas it is reported that the Department of Justice, through its spies, secret agents, and officers, have been employing methods comparable to those employed by the Czar in Russia before the days of the revolution, methods which have always been employed by autocratic and tyrannical governments and which are repugnant to and can no longer be tolerated by the liberty-loving people of America; and

Whereas it is stated that such immoral, illegal, and unconstitutional methods as threats, intimidation, provocation by Government agents to crime, search, seizure, and arrest without warrant, brutal beatings and torture of prisoners, the holding of prisoners without trial, without access to friends or counsel, the fabrication of testimony and perjury by Government agents, the inflicting of cruel and unusual punishments, the compelling of persons to be witnesses against themselves, with the squandering of funds for the carrying on of propaganda to prejudice the public in favor of a Department of Justice which would permit such criminal methods, have been employed; and

Whereas there can be no return to orderly, legal, and constitutional government in the United States while the Department of Justice is employing, as the evidence would indicate it is, such methods in open violation of the laws, of the Constitution, and of the principles of humanity and justice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to hold hearings, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee; to sit and act at such times as it may deem necessary during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, in order to determine whether these allegations of illegal and criminal actions on the part of the Department of Justice are well founded, said committee or subcommittee to report its findings to the Senate in order that the Senate may take such action as would seem to be justified, such as a recommendation to the President of the summary dismissal from the public service of all of those who might be found to be guilty and a prosecution of them for their crimes.

RUSSIAN RAILWAY SERVICE CORPS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the other day, on the call of the calendar, when the bill (S. 3865) providing for the men and officers in the Russian Railway Service Corps the status of enlisted men and officers of the United States Army when discharged was reached, its consideration was objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. The Senator from Utah announced yesterday on the floor that, after having examined the bill and the report, he desired to withdraw his objection. There was no other objection at the time. That being the case, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the officers who are or have been in the Russian Railway Service Corps, organized by the War Department in 1917 under the authority of the President of the United States, shall henceforth have the status as to honorable discharge, when they are or if they have been honorably discharged from such service, of officers honorably discharged from the Army of the United States.

That all officers of this corps, active and honorably discharged, shall be entitled to receive all benefits under the war-risk and war-compensation acts, with all amendments thereto: Provided, That applications for war-risk insurance shall not be granted unless the applications therefor shall be made within 120 days from and after the passage of this act.

That any officer of the Russian Railway Service Corps who, while in active service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after the passage of this act, becomes or has become totally or permanently disabled, or dies, or has died, without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance in the manner provided for in section 401 of the war-risk insurance act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the officers in the Russian Railway Service Corps the status of officers of the United States Army when discharged."

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to state that in the Agricultural appropriation act, which the President has approved, there is a provision which was not in the bill as passed by the two Houses. The House has passed a joint resolution correcting that error, and it is now on the desk of the Vice President. I wish the Senator would yield to me so that I can have that joint resolution taken up and passed.

Mr. McCORMICK. For the correction of a typographical error?

Mr. NORRIS. For the correction of an error made in the House.

Mr. McCORMICK. I yield to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 370) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920, was read twice by its title.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the particular language that is repealed was known as the Comer amendment in the Senate. It was stricken out in conference and agreed to by both Houses. All that this joint resolution does is to repeal that part which was put in by mistake.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc, That the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920, which reads as follows: "That hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended, shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton standard grades of the United States from the grades of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton standard grades as established in said act," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator if he will not permit the report to go over for to-day. There is a matter in it in which some of the people of my State feel a very deep interest, and I should like to have an opportunity to communicate with them by wire to know whether the present terms of the bill reach the situation at all as they desire to have it covered. In my opinion they do not, but I may be in error. I certainly have no desire to delay the matter, but I wish an opportunity to communicate with them. I can do that between now and to-morrow morning.

Mr. WARREN. Would it serve the Senator's purpose to have me submit the report without moving its adoption, because until we do that the House is unable to move toward action on the report?

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the making of the report, if action on the report is to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. I ask that the report may be received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The report will be received, lie on the table, and be printed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PAGE. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes. In view of the conditions that confront us, I ask that the report may lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock I shall ask that it be taken up for consideration.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 7, 8, 12, 14, 17, 19, 21, 25, 26, 27, 29, 35, 36, 55, 56, 57, 58, 68, 69, 72, 74, 75, 77, 81, 86, 88, 91, 92, 93, 100, 102, 103, 104.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 15, 16, 18, 20, 23, 34, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 66, 70, 71, 73, 76, 79, 83, 84, 89, 90, 94, 96, 97, 98, 101, 105, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the first line of said amendment strike out the figures "$50,000" and reinsert in lieu thereof the following: "$30,000"; and, in the fourteenth line of said amendment, after the word "oil," occurring in the phrase "and those from all royalty oil," insert the following: "from lands in the naval reserves"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$30,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$3,883,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$4,962,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, is hereby directed to furnish to the proper officers in the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia of the United States, on or before June 30, 1921, statements of the services of all persons from those several places who served in the Navy during the War with Germany, and for that purpose a sum not to exceed $200,000 is hereby appropriated for obtaining the necessary material and the employment of the necessary clerical force, and the further sum of $100,000 shall be allotted of the appropriation of $404,140 for temporary employees, Bureau of Navigation, contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921: Provided, That no part of the said appropriation of $404,140, or of the appropriation of $200,000 herein made, shall be used for the pay of any employee who is engaged on other than work of the Bureau of Navigation."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "two persons"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$1,200,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$850,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$300,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$275,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$600,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$575,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$500,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$375,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish at two of the permanent naval training stations experimental summer schools for boys between the ages of 16 and 20 years. For this purpose he is authorized to use such buildings, or other accommodations, at such training stations; to loan any naval equipment necessary for such purposes, and to give instructions which will fit them for service in the Navy of the United States. He is empowered to establish and enforce such rules within the camp as may be necessary and to detail such members of the naval personnel as may be required in order to encourage and execute the spirit of this act. The Secretary of the Navy is further authorized to loan the necessary naval uniforms during the period of training and to furnish subsistence, medical attendance, and other necessary incidental expenses for those attending these schools: Provided, That those under instruction, with the consent of their parents or their guardians, shall enroll in the Naval Reserve Force for not less than three months, and no person not so enrolled shall be admitted to said training schools. For carrying out the provisions of this paragraph the sum of $200,000 is appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"Provided further, That, until June 30, 1922, of the Organized Militia as provided by law, such part as may be duly prescribed in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall constitute a Naval Militia; and, until June 30, 1922, such of the Naval Militia as now is in existence, and as now organized and prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy under authority of the act of Congress approved February 16, 1914, shall be a part of the Naval Reserve Force, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to maintain and provide for said Naval Militia as provided in said act: Provided further, That upon their enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force, and not otherwise, until June 30, 1922, the members of said Naval Militia shall have all the benefits, gratuities, privileges, and emoluments provided by law for other members of the Naval Reserve Force; and that, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, duty performed in the Naval Militia may be counted as active service for the maintenance of efficiency required by law for members of the Naval Reserve Force: And provided further, That all moneys appropriated for the Naval Reserve Force or for the Naval Militia shall constitute one fund and hereby are made available, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for both."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$200,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 65, 67, 78, 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendments and in lieu thereof insert, on page 20, after line 6, the following:

"That a special joint committee is hereby created, to be composed of five Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The committee shall investigate the advisability of establishing, developing, and maintaining a naval base on San Francisco Bay or the waters tributary thereto. The committee shall prepare comparative estimates of the cost of acquiring, establishing, developing, and maintaining such sites and shall report to the Congress of the United States not later than December 31, 1920, the result of its investigation, together with such other recommendations, estimates, and information as it deems proper, including information concerning a deeper channel to Mare Island Navy Yard and a sufficient water basin at Mare Island.

"That said committee shall also investigate and report in like manner as to the advisability and cost of establishing an aviation base at Sand Point, King County, Wash.; a submarine base at Los Angeles Harbor (San Pedro), Calif.; and a submarine, destroyer, and aviation base at Port Angeles, Wash.

"That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to detail such technical experts to assist the committee as the committee may request.

"That the expenses of said committee shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives and one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof; and for the cost of borings and the procuring and collating of all other technical data in connection with such investigation, there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $50,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$10,751,950"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his or her own misconduct, of any officer, enlisted man, or nurse on the active list of the Regular Navy or Regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child, to any other dependent relative of such officer, enlisted man, or nurse previously designated by him or her, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer, enlisted man, or nurse at the date of his or her death. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man or nurse having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his or her death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the pay of the Navy and pay of the Marine Corps, respectively: Provided, That nothing in this section or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this section applicable to officers, enlisted men, or nurses of any forces of the Navy of the United States other than those of the Regular Navy and Marine Corps, and nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or probationary appointments in the Regular Navy or Marine Corps: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall apply to the officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard, and the Secretary of the Treasury will cause payment to be made accordingly."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"That the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall have the relative rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy, and that hereafter he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the list of commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey not below the rank of commander for a term of four years, and may be reappointed for further periods of four years each."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "including not to exceed $20,000 for the purchase of land necessary for radio shore stations"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 99, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is hereby permanently established at 27,400, distribution in the various grades to be made in the same proportion as provided under existing law: Provided, That all officers serving temporarily in the grades of captain and below upon the date of the passage of this act shall be eligible to fill existing vacancies and those hereby created in the permanent authorized strength in said grades by transfer to or reappointment in the permanent Marine Corps in the grades not above that of captain. Transfers so made shall be without regard to age, and if found not qualified for transfer to the same grade as that held by them on the date of transfer then to lower grades after qualification. All officers so transferred shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, under such rules as he may prescribe, their mental, moral, professional, and physical qualifications to perform the duties of the grade to which transferred or reappointed and shall take precedence with each other and with other officers of the Marine Corps in such order as may be recommended by a board of marine officers and approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That all persons who served honorably as officers in the Marine Corps or Marine Corps Reserve on active duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and the date of the passage of this act and who have been honorably discharged or assigned to inactive duty shall be eligible for permanent appointment in the same or a lower rank than that held on discharge or assignment to inactive duty, but not above the rank of captain, to fill vacancies existing or hereby created in the permanent authorized strength of the Marine Corps under the same conditions as those above prescribed for officers now in the service: Provided further, That officers now holding temporary commissions in the Marine Corps and who have had more than 10 years' service therein, if not found qualified for permanent commissions, and who are recommended by the board herein provided for, may be appointed warrant officers in the Marine Corps; and the authorized number of warrant officers is hereby increased by a number not to exceed 50 to provide for the appointment of the aforesaid officers: Provided further, That all transfers and appointments made in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be accomplished by June 30, 1921: Provided further, That the officers now holding temporary appointments as commissioned officers in the Marine Corps may retain their temporary commissions until the permanent appointments provided for in the foregoing section shall have been made."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 106, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ on active duty, with their own consent, members of the Naval Reserve Force in enlisted ratings, the number so employed not to exceed during any fiscal year the average of 20,000 men: Provided, That the number of naval reservists, so employed on active duty, together with the total number of enlisted men in the Regular Navy, shall not exceed the total enlisted strength of the Navy as authorized by law: Provided further, That such members of the Naval Reserve Force so employed shall serve on active duty for not less than 12 nor more than 18 months unless sooner released: Provided further, That hereafter no person shall be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force except for general service: And provided further, That the number of commissioned officers of the line, permanent, temporary, and reserve on active duty shall not exceed 4 per cent of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Regular Navy, and the number of staff officers on active duty of whatever kind shall be in the same proportions as authorized by existing law: Provided further, That 500 reserve officers are also authorized to be employed in the aviation and auxiliary service: And provided further, That until December 31, 1921, temporary appointments now existing may be continued in force in any grade or rank, not to exceed the number allowed in any grade or rank based upon the total permanent authorized commissioned strength of the line or of any staff corps; and, within the limitations herein prescribed, officers of the Naval Reserve Force may, with their own consent, be continued on active duty ashore or afloat, including three on shore duty in the Historical Section of the Office of Naval Intelligence, who may be retained on active duty beyond the age of disenrollment but not beyond June 30, 1922: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as reducing the permanent commissioned or enlisted strength of the Regular Navy as authorized by existing law.

"That all officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy who have heretofore incurred or may hereafter incur physical disability in line of duty shall be eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided by law for officers of the Regular Navy who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

"SEC. 3. That officers holding temporary commissioned and warrant ranks in the Navy and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks shall be eligible for transfer to an appointment in the permanent grades or ranks in the Navy for which they may be found qualified not above that held by them on the date of transfer, but not to exceed a total of 1,200 commissioned officers in the line, of which number 500 may be appointed from class 5, Naval Reserve Flying Corps, with proportionate number in all Staff Corps as now authorized by law, except that the Medical, Dental, and Supply Corps shall be entitled to such additional numbers as are necessary to make up the full quota of officers in those corps, as now authorized by law: Provided, That officers so appointed to the line of the Navy shall take rank in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank, and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks found qualified for a given rank shall be arranged according to their precedence among themselves and commissioned in the permanent service next after the lowest temporary officer who qualifies for the same rank and is appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act:

"Provided further, That included in the number of transfers and appointments hereinbefore allowed, commissioned officers of the Coast Guard, who have served creditably under the Navy Department in the war with the German Government, upon suitable application approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, may be appointed to a permanent rank or grade in the Navy for which found qualified by a board of naval officers under the provisions of existing law, but not above the rank of lieutenant commander, and shall take such precedence therein as the Secretary of the Navy may determine: Provided further, That for the purposes of computing longevity pay and retirement privileges of officers and enlisted men of the Navy, all creditable service in the Coast Guard and former Revenue-Cutter Service shall be counted.

"SEC. 4. That in addition to the number of transfers and appointments hereinbefore allowed, commissioned warrant officers of more than 15 years' service since date of warrant or date of first appointment as paymaster's clerk, pharmacist, or mate, who have creditably served in the war with the German Government in temporary commissioned ranks or grades in the regular Navy, shall be appointed to a permanent rank or grade for which they may be qualified as established and shown by their records of service during their term of service not above the temporary rank or grade held by them at the time of transfer: Provided, That officers so transferred to the line of the Navy shall take rank therein in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank: Provided further, That all officers so transferred in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of this act to the Staff Corps of the Navy shall take precedence with each other and with other officers in the Navy in such order as may be recommended by a board of naval officers and approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That no transfers or appointments made in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of this act shall be to a higher grade or rank than lieutenant in the Navy: And provided further, That officers appointed to the permanent Navy in accordance with the foregoing sections who now hold permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant rank in the United States Navy shall, if they thereafter fail professionally on examination for promotion, revert to such permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant status.

"SEC. 5. That officers appointed under any of the foregoing provisions shall be not more than 35 years of age when so appointed to the line of the Navy, Construction Corps, or Supply Corps, and not more than 43 years of age when so appointed to the Corps of Chaplains, or to the Medical, Dental, or Civil Engineering Corps: Provided, That said age limits shall be increased in the cases of officers who have rendered prior service as paymaster's clerks, or as mates, or as warrant or commissioned officers in the naval service to the extent of all prior naval service: Provided further, That officers originally appointed to the Dental Corps above the said age limits shall be eligible for appointment and promotion under this act irrespective of age: And provided further, That officers of the line of the Navy who are appointed thereto pursuant to this act from sources other than the Naval Academy shall not be ineligible for promotion by reason of age as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 579), until they have rendered 10 years' service in the grade of lieutenant commander, 6 years' service in the grade of commander, or 8 years' service in the grade of captain, respectively, upon the completion of which service such officers, if then ineligible for promotion by reason of age, shall be retired in accordance with said act: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, promotions to lieutenant (junior grade) and lieutenant may be made without regard to length of service: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, officers of the permanent Navy who have served satisfactorily during the war with the German Government in a temporary grade or rank shall be eligible under the provisions of existing law for selection for promotion or for promotion to the same permanent grade or rank without regard to statutory requirements other than age and professional and physical examination: And provided further, That in making reductions in rank as may be required by this act, officers holding temporary appointments may be given temporary appointments in lower grades, and officers so appointed shall take precedence from the dates of their original appointments in such lower grades.

"SEC. 6. That in case any enlisted man or enrolled man who, since the 11th day of November, 1918, has been or hereafter shall be discharged from any branch or class of the naval service for the purpose of reenlisting in the Navy or Marine Corps or heretofore has extended or hereafter shall extend his enlistment therein, he shall be entitled to the payment of the $60 bonus provided in section 1406 of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes,' approved February 24, 1919, and to travel pay as authorized in section 3 of the act entitled 'An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions,' approved February 28, 1919: Provided, That only one bonus shall be paid to the same person.

"SEC. 7. That hereafter enlistments in the Navy and in the Marine Corps may be for terms of two, three, or four years, and all laws now applicable to four-year enlistments shall apply, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to enlistments for a shorter period with proportionate benefits upon discharge and reenlistment: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to establish such grades and ratings as may be necessary for the proper administration of the enlisted personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps.

"SEC. 8. That section 125 of the act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, shall hereafter be in full force and effect as originally enacted, notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled 'An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions,' approved February 28, 1919: Provided, That the words 'or the Secretary of the Navy,' shall be inserted immediately after the words 'the Secretary of War' wherever those words appear in section 125 of the act approved June 3, 1916, hereinbefore referred to.

"SEC. 9. That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, withhold any part or all of the retainer pay which may be due a member of the Naval Reserve Force where such members fail to perform such duty as may be prescribed by law for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided, That any money so withheld shall be credited to the appropriation for organizing and administering the Naval Reserve Force to be used for any purpose that the Secretary of the Navy may consider proper to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided further, That hereafter the minimum amount of active service required for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall be the same as for the Naval Reserve.

"SEC. 10. That the age limits for promotion by selection, which, under existing law, will become effective on June 30, 1920, are hereby deferred until June 30, 1921, in the cases only of those officers who may request such deferment."

And the Senate agree to the same.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ESTOPINAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES.

FEBRUARY 29, 1920.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, late a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their immediate consideration.

The resolutions (S. Res. 379) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be paid to his high character and distinguished public services.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, the death on April 28, 1919, of Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, a distinguished Member of the House from Louisiana, my friend and colleague, has left an ineffaceable imprint on the hearts and minds of his beloved people. The late Congressman was no offshoot of fate, nor the result of political accident. Neither was he the product of an artificially prepared career for a fixed purpose. He won the affection of his community naturally, and grew and developed amidst the friends and neighbors he served. They loved and revered him, and he was the personification of what they stood for. Gen. ESTOPINAL always reflected the views and aspirations of his constituency; his glory was their glory; their interests and desires his.

Born on January 30, 1845, in the Parish of St. Bernard, just below the city of New Orleans, young ESTOPINAL was reared on his father's sugar plantation. He received his early education in the public schools of his parish and at New Orleans, but like the other youth of his enshrined Southland renounced a scholastic career to enlist in 1862, at the age of 17, in the Confederate Army, as an orderly seregant in Company G, Twenty-eighth Louisiana Regiment. He was at the siege of Vicksburg, where he commanded the little squad which took the Union prisoners from the captured gunboat Indianola to Libby Prison, Va. It will be remembered that the fall of Vicksburg had a potent effect on the fortunes of the Confederacy. Generals Grant and Sherman were extremely anxious to capture that city in order to control the Mississippi River and cut off supplies from the West. After much preliminary maneuvering in conjunction with Admiral Porter, who performed very valuable service with his fleet of gunboats, Grant finally took the city. It was a long, bloody siege, and the men in gray held out courageously until the end, July 4, 1863, but the Union victory was complete and the Confederacy cut in two.

After the fall of Vicksburg young ESTOPINAL joined the Twenty-second Louisiana Regiment, participating in the Mobile campaign, and later surrendered at Cuba Station.

Following the war ALBERT ESTOPINAL engaged in merchandising at New Orleans for five years, but being conscious of the necessity for public service to restore order and good government, he had already begun to turn his mind to the problems of reconstruction. The South was torn and bleeding, and the tribulations and disappointments of her people taxed beyond expression the strength and fortitude of her sons. Louisiana suffered particularly from the war, as some of her soil had been held by Federal troops through a great part of the conflict, and in consequence the plantations drained of live stock, farm implements, food for man and beast, and a large part of their labor. Taxable property had been reduced almost two-thirds. The returning soldier found his plantation in the worst possible state of repair, and his title subject to dispute under the confiscation laws, while much had been seized by Treasury agents or dishonest speculators.

A blighted cotton crop in 1866 was followed the next year by an almost complete failure, while the Mississippi exacted the penalty of neglected and broken levees by devastating floods. Only in 1868 after two crop failures did the planters obtain an average crop in the great staples—sugar and cotton. Grinding necessity, as well as remorseless political ostracism, drove the better class of young men into indifference to public concerns and engrossment in their private affairs. Moreover, ignorant, unprincipled legislation bred a certain temporary apathy even to their own interests. Already the finances of the State were in a sad condition; back taxes were in arrears, and Louisiana could not even meet the interest on current debt. There was such a saturnalia of extravagance and corruption in public affairs as to demoralize the strongest men.

It was to battle with conditions like these, Mr. President, that ESTOPINAL and his brothers in arms returned. And as the real caliber of a man is fathomed only in time of distress and disappointment, so was the stability and future of the new Southland tested in this dark era of reconstruction. Her final triumph after years of toil and steadfast courage is the best and most convincing evidence of the metal of men like ALBERT ESTOPINAL. They were the bedrock and invigorating influence which inspired and guided those who came after, and it is to these benefactors—these great pioneers—we of the flourishing and prosperous South owe our everlasting gratitude.

ESTOPINAL'S election as sheriff in 1872, a responsible and competitive political office in rural affairs, and his reelection in 1874, followed by service in the lower house of the Louisiana Legislature in 1876 and again in 1878, demonstrated his early hold on the affections of St. Bernard. His public career then began to assume a more liberal and comprehensive mold. He was chosen in 1879 as a delegate to the constitutional convention to assist in framing Louisiana's organic law, and in 1880 was sent to the State senate, where he served creditably for 20 years—until 1900. During this period, in 1898, he was again a member of the constitutional convention of that year and served with distinction. In 1900, as running mate to Gov. William Wright Heard, he was elected lieutenant governor and contributed largely to the stability and constructiveness of that administration, one of the very best ever enjoyed by the State of Louisiana. He was elected to Congress in 1908 from the first district as successor to Gen. Adolph Meyer, which place he held continuously until his untimely death in April, 1919.

Mr. President, the elevation of Gen. ESTOPINAL from the local sphere, wherein he served so well, to the broader and far-reaching field of national legislator combined admirably the character of soldier—the epitome of service and self-denial—with that of an already experienced and ripe public servant. He was immediately assigned to the important Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and entered upon his congressional duties with vim and enthusiasm, laboring zealously for a large and well-equipped Navy as our first line of national defense, and the wisdom of this course was fully demonstrated by the wonderful record of our Navy during the recent World War.

The general was not local or provincial in viewpoint nor selfish in demands. He contributed to the development of our Navy and the formation of a national maritime policy the sound intellect and mental assiduity typical of his whole career. Gen. ESTOPINAL was a progressive and stable, deliberate, and comprehensive, decisive, and rational statesman. He was not an opportunist; men always knew where he stood. And knowing was sufficient. No measure of mere persuasion or glamor of personal or political expediency could swerve this soldier-statesman from the path of principle. Honesty, political courage, and a scrupulous regard for justice were the mainsprings of his very nature.

Mr. President, people were struck with the happiness and charm of Gen. ESTOPINAL'S family life; it was inspiring and ideal. In February, 1868, he married Miss Eliska Legier, which felicitous union was blessed with 16 children, 10 of whom grew to maturity and endeared his later life. Nine sons and one daughter were blessed with the proud possession of this noble father, and four sons served faithfully during the last Great War, as the general had done before them in the Civil War. The Congressman told me he had once umpired a baseball game in which all nine boys participated, several on each side. What an extraordinary and unusual spectacle! In the intricate and devious game of life these nine sons are all substantial players, and the memory of their forebear's work and accomplishment, I know, will mark their courses in his footpath. Imitation of his good work will be some recompense for his unstinted service to State and Nation.

Mr. President, this father's solicitude for his 10 children—one of them a lovely girl who preceded him to the grave by a few years—was only exceeded by his husbandly devotion. He was tender and kind in the extreme—a faithful and devoted husband—and the hearts of Mrs. Ransdell and myself are full of sympathy for his dear wife and children in their great bereavement. May the memory of his good works and the deep gratitude of his people in a measure help to assuage their grief.

I was deeply impressed when attending the funeral of Gen. ESTOPINAL that his nine sons and three nephews performed the entire pallbearer service. They carried the coffin from the beautiful courthouse in St. Bernard, where it had lain in state, to the train en route to New Orleans. Reaching there these nine sons and nephews conveyed the coffin to the hearse, from the hearse to the church, thence from the church back to the hearse, and at the graveyard they put it into his last resting place. I think this a most beautiful custom and regret that it can be emulated in very few instances, for not many men have nine sons to perform this last sad office for them. It must have been a proud satisfaction to them and their dear mother to render this last service of love to their honored father.

I wintessed something similar in the late fall of 1881 while a student at Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., of which Dr. Eliphalet Nott Potter was then president. One of his brothers, Mr. Clarkson N. Potter, a very prominent man of the Empire State, had died, and his remains were brought to the college burial place for interment. It was a cold, beautiful day and the ground was covered deep in snow. The graveyard was an ideal spot, in which there were many fine trees. Union being a quasi military institution, a number of the students were in full uniform. The coffin was laid in the grave by six brothers, each of whom held high position, one being Rev. Henry C. Potter, subsequently Episcopal bishop of the city of New York, and another president of the college, as stated. As a college boy I was very much struck by the beauty of that service and have often thought what a privilege it was for six brothers to lay their beloved dead in his grave. Never again did I view a like spectacle until 38 years later I stood at the bier of Gen. ESTOPINAL.

His funeral was a most impressive sight, and everyone was attracted by the universal tribute of honor and respect to his memory by the entire community. The poor people of his district, many of them of foreign extraction, were particularly in evidence. He had been their loyal and sympathetic friend and counselor; had continually striven for their welfare and consistently guided them in their trials and misfortunes. He even assisted his neighbors in their every-day personal affairs, and often importuned the less-fortunate classes to properly educate their children for life's battle. In fact, I have heard it said that the general had the reputation of christening, marrying, and burying his people. He was especially active during the yellow-fever epidemic of 1878 in ministering to friends stricken with that fatal disease and nursing them back to health at the risk of his own life.

Mr. President, since ALBERT ESTOPINAL first essayed a man's part on the stage of life 60 years ago, the world has passed through its most progressive and interesting period. We now live in an age of steel, steam, and electricity; but 60 years ago they were little known and less used. The great ocean fleets of that time were principally of wood, and the large buildings were of brick, stone, and concrete. To-day nearly all the ships plying the deep are made of steel, and steel enters into the construction of practically every building, bridge, and mechanical instrument of any magnitude, besides constituting the principal part in our immense railway trackage.

Many of the greatest inventive, scientific, mechanical, and business geniuses were contemporary with ESTOPINAL—such men, for instance, as Thomas A. Edison, Alexander Graham Bell, Andrew Carnegie, and John D. Rockefeller. ESTOPINAL saw the wonderful advance of iron and steel in all their ramifications; the marvels of oil and its sister element, coal; the discoveries and uses of electricity; the origin and growth of the telephone. In fact, he witnessed the development and perfection of sleeping and dining cars, refrigeration, the phonograph, submarine, X ray, and innumerable improvements in chemistry, surgery, medicine, metallurgy, and many other arts and sciences.

As a child ALBERT ESTOPINAL read Mother Shipton's prophecy that "carriages without horses shall go." He lived to see that prophecy a reality. He saw countless automobiles and trucks speeding over good roads and streets from one end of the Nation to the other, carrying passengers and freight at a speed several times as great as the swiftest horse team; also steam tractors plowing and seeding the fields and harvesting the crops.

When he entered Congress 12 years ago Marconi was beginning to perfect the wireless telegraphy which, in conjunction with the telephone, permits us to converse from this city with friends in London or Paris; in fact, to girdle the globe with the human voice. The flying machine was then one of the fond hopes of science, but very few believed it possible. Gen. ESTOPINAL saw the first successful demonstration of that greatest of all modern inventions illustrated by the Wright brothers at Fort Myer in this city with a heavier-than-air plane. Since then navigation of the air has become almost an exact science.

Mr. President, it is impossible to enumerate the truly remarkable progress in every branch which science and industry have made during the past 60 years—an era which witnessed greater advances, more material benefits, more forward steps for the comfort, convenience, and happiness of mankind than the world experienced during the previous three centuries. And ALBERT ESTOPINAL was an intelligent and contributing factor toward this improvement during this wondrous span of little more than half a century crowded with so many human miracles and great ideas.

The State of Louisiana has kept pace with the general advance of mankind during this enlightened period. Its agricultural, mineral, and commercial growth has been almost fabulous. Much of its natural resource and general industrial potentiality of the sixties has been transformed into a great and glorious reality, and Louisiana is proud of that progress which has come from the industry and statesmanship of her people, in all of which ALBERT ESTOPINAL bore a man's part.

This many-sided man, Mr. President, possessed one of the most unusual and exceptional gifts that could be bestowed on anyone. He was a versatile and accomplished linguist, speaking English, French, and Spanish fluently, and friends versed in these languages often lauded him about his facility in them with pen and tongue. Fellow Members of the House frequently called on the general to translate their French communications, and in this work he always acquitted himself well. When the old French war horse, Marshal Joffre, hero of the Marne, paid his memorable visit to our land as a national tribute of the respect and gratitude France felt for our contribution to victory and world peace, honoring the Halls of Congress with his presence, Gen. ESTOPINAL acted as interpreter in the interchange of felicitations between the great French soldier patriot and Members of the House. In this mercenary age of opportunism I dare say we shall find very few practical men of any rank and consequence who have mastered in so superior a way these very difficult romance languages in addition to their mother tongue. Knowledge of a foreign language by men of affairs in this country is slight indeed, and that fact is largely responsible for the lack of assimilation of American business men with our foreign competitors in the development of the world trade so essential to our national prosperity in future years. It is the incapacity of our citizen to deal directly and adequately with the French, Spanish, Italian, and German trader which unfortunately hampers our commercial relations to the decided advantage of other countries. Germany's enterprising efforts in this direction were bearing rich fruit at the outbreak of the last war and are worth imitation.

Mr. President, Gen. ESTOPINAL was my warm personal friend, and I knew something of his character. Different traits attract different men, but his uniform courtliness and charm of manner attracted me most. He was mild and graceful and pleasant, yet withal as firm as any man I have ever known. Cowper has said:

> A moral, sensible, and well-bred man
> Will not affront me, and no other can.

Courtesy was one of the component parts of his nature, and even strangers admired and respected his demeanor. But there was nothing cold or haughty about his make-up. He was modest and unassuming, never boastful, and, in fact, reticent until the time was propitious for expressing his conviction. In truth, I never knew a more thorough gentleman, with all that attribute implies. He was indeed a Chesterfield.

The dead Congressman was a devout Catholic, was nurtured in the faith, believed firmly in its tenets, and revered its teachings. Even in the days of his last painful illness he was apparently a happy man, patient and uncomplaining. Philosophers have wondered "that the Christian religion, which seems to have no other object than the felicity of another life, should also constitute the happiness of this." I am confident that the contentment of our departed friend came not alone from satisfaction of material accomplishment, but in a superior degree from an unsullied conscience, for he must have drunk unquenchably from that fathomless spring of Christian rectitude whence our earthly happiness alone can come. The sincerity of his profession and the practice of his faith was an inspiration in this day of careless modernism, utter indifference to all religious practices, and general worship of mammon.

Mr. President, it is not material what one says on an occasion like this, but how he feels. To be acquainted with Gen. ESTOPINAL was to love him, and my wife and I were deeply grieved when he was called to the "unknown and silent shore whence no one has ever returned." Friendship for him and his loved ones was a source of joy to us, and its memory will be one of our sweetest pleasures.

> There is no death! What seems so is transition;
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian
> Whose portal we call death.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, pressure of public duties has deprived me of the opportunity to prepare a formal address. Nevertheless I avail myself of the privilege of taking a humble part in these ceremonies commemorating the life and the character of a great and a good man.

Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL experienced a long and useful career. Throughout that career, whether as a soldier, an officer in his State government, a Member of the National Congress, or as a private citizen, he maintained the highest standard of American manhood.

One who performs military service in a great war can not fail to be influenced throughout his life by that experience. The men who served in the Civil War, in the ranks of the Union armies or in the armies of the Confederacy, and who survived that conflict, as a rule regarded their service in that war as the greatest experience of their lives.

Mr. President, among the forces of the Union and among the soldiers of the Confederacy there were entire regiments in which every officer and every private earned the crown of a hero. In the great list of the Civil War heroes there was no braver soldier than ALBERT ESTOPINAL. At the age of 18 he entered the ranks of the Confederate Army and served throughout the conflict. When the war had ended and it became his duty and his privilege to resume the obligations of citizenship, like thousands of other soldiers who fought in the armies of the South, he found the tasks and the burdens that confronted him as great or even greater than those which he had borne during hostilities.

With a calmness and a confidence that only brave men manifest, he discharged the duties of private citizenship in Louisiana in a time when those duties taxed the energy, exhausted the resources, and tested the courage of the bravest of the brave. Throughout the long and bitter experiences of reconstruction he showed his courage as he had proved it when performing military duties.

As a Representative in Congress, which position he was filling at the time of his departure, he reflected the best traditions and memories as well as the most sacred obligations devolving upon men who serve in that great legislative body. In an experience of almost 18 years in Congress I have never known a man of either body who in my opinion possessed and displayed in all his thoughts and activities a more fully developed consciousness of duty or who has made a readier response to the exacting demands of public life. He was prominent in the deliberations and in the legislation of Congress, always manifesting a willingness and a desire to avail himself of the knowledge and the experience of his associates.

Louisiana has given to Congress and to the service of the Nation many great men. It has never known a more capable or faithful servant than Gen. ESTOPINAL. In public life we form many attachments but few lasting friendships; indeed, I think it is the experience of most men who are fortunate enough to live to old age that they enjoy few permanent friendships during life. No man whom I have known in public or private life deserved more friends than Mr. ESTOPINAL enjoyed. He never betrayed a confidence, never manifested overbearing or even thoughtlessness, for, as said by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], he was the embodiment of knightly courtesy.

He was representative in his character and conduct of what has sometimes been termed the old style "Southern gentleman." I have never believed that there is any fundamental difference in gentlemen. Gentlemen are alike whether living in one section or another, whether born in one country or another, in all the essential attributes and characteristics which combine to make a noble man; but Gen. ESTOPINAL in his habits, his mannerisms, and his personal appearance was representative of that type of citizenship we have come to know as the "Southern gentleman."

I have said that he was a brave Confederate soldier. He retained, however, no prejudice as a result of his experience in the Civil War, or as a result of his experience during the period of reconstruction. Congress since the Civil War has had the benefit of the wisdom of many brave men who performed military service during that war. As a rule, indeed I believe I may say almost without exception, those men have represented the highest types of public servants. It is regrettable that the hour is approaching when the Union can no longer hope to enjoy the experience and the efforts of men who fought in the Civil War. Within the last few weeks the sole representative in the Senate during this Congress who had served in the Confederate Army passed away. The late Senator from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, was a great officer, a loyal citizen, a patriotic statesman. There now remain in this Chamber but two Senators who were soldiers in the Civil War, and those two were in the Union Army. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] are both vigorous and active. All their colleagues hope that they may live long to honor their people and to serve their Nation.

In character Gen. ESTOPINAL combined all the attributes of well-balanced, thoughtful manhood. He was as gentle and as tender as a woman; as brave and as chivalrous as a knight of old; as loyal to duty as any man who ever rendered public service.

I have referred to the fact that one who engages in military service during a great war is impressed in character and in thought throughout life with that experience. When his last hour was approaching and the good man who had been called to offer religious consolation for the dying Representative reminded him of his approaching end, Mr. ESTOPINAL replied, "You know I am an old fighter," thus exemplifying in death that courage which never failed him in the conflicts of life.

In his death the public lost an able and faithful servant, his wife a devoted husband, his children an affectionate father. His acts and his characteristics will inspire those who knew him and who survive him to better living.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the eloquent words of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] reviewing the life and services of Gen. ESTOPINAL, and the able and sympathetic address just concluded by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], leave but little for me to add upon this occasion.

The pressing duties incident to the closing hours of this prolonged as well as exacting session have denied me opportunity to prepare an address which, so far as I am competent, would adequately deal with the illustrious career and splendid services of our deceased friend in whose honor these memorial services are held. My words therefore will come haltingly and will perforce imperfectly traverse fields so completely appropriated by the preceding speakers.

I have always felt a profound interest in the great Commonwealth of Louisiana, resting largely, perhaps, upon sentimental reasons, it being the State of my mother's birth. But to all Americans Louisiana is rich in historic interest and important in contributions made to our Nation's growth and development. There is a fascination and spirit of romance and chivalry connected with Louisiana that seem to be peculiarly her own, and which are denied in such fullness and rich perfection to any other State. She seems to breathe the spirit of poetry and music and song, and to carry us into the atmosphere of heroic and knightly men, and gracious, beauteous women; to a land of sunshine and flowers; a land of peace and perpetual delight; a land of beauty and charm and laughter; a land upon which nature has lavished her choicest gifts and with prodigality poured out her choicest blessings upon all things possessing life. When we speak of Louisiana we think of Spain and her conquest of the New World. We remember France, glorious and beautiful France, and the standard of beauty and greatness and power which through the centuries she has proudly held aloft. We remember Jefferson and his prophetic mind, and qualities of statesmanship unsurpassed in any age, and his wise and prudent course which detached an empire from an empire beyond the seas and gave to the Republic of the New World a territory stretching into lands of fable from which Commonwealths have been carved, now finding their places under the starry banner of this puissant Nation.

When we speak of Louisiana we remember the great men who have sprung from her loins, and whose lives and services have added to the imperishable glory of this Republic.

This historic and glorious Commonwealth was the mother of our departed friend who for so many years gave her loyal service, and in the National Congress, with patriotic zeal, sought the advancement of his country and the honor of his State and Nation. He lived up to the highest traditions of his State, and embodied in his life those ideals which have given to this Nation a preeminence to which no other country can aspire.

We have learned from the historical review of his life and services the important part which he played in his own State and the fidelity with which he served his parish, his county, and his Commonwealth. We have learned of his supreme love of home, and that compelling force which ever drew him to the place of his birth, and restrained his feet from wandering into other lands or climes. There was a fixity, a tenacity of purpose, a spirit of devotion that was almost religious in its fervor which bound him to the place of his birth and to the spot which constituted his home during his entire life. Too much can not be said in praise of the qualities which bind individuals to home and to State in the fluid and unrestful conditions to which individuals and society are subject. We turn for guidance and inspiration to the lives of those who possess the highest virtues, and the characteristics which find expression in the home builders and in the construction of community life and the protection of State integrity.

Of such characters great States are made. The family is the foundation of the State, and the family life reproduces itself in the community and in the State life. Men and women who build enduring homes, whose affections bind them to home, and who invest that home with a spirit of sacredness, as if it were a veritable altar erected to a holy cause, become the standard bearers of true civilization and upholders of moral and spiritual freedom which must be maintained if liberty shall endure and Christian civilization persist.

The family life of Gen. ESTOPINAL was beautiful and inspirational. It attracted the attention of all who knew him. It was an example to be followed in an age of materialism and of unbridled ambition for wealth and place and power. We may with profit examine the life and the services of this noble man. He was not rich measured by the swollen fortunes which have been accumulated by some of the Napoleons of finance whose names are known throughout our land. He did not have the power to control States or Nation; nor did he, like a flaming comet, pass through the political firmament of our land; and yet measured by the true standard, the enduring standard, he was a great man and a great American, and a citizen in the kingdom which rises higher and asserts increasing power and glory—the kingdom of righteousness, the kingdom of the Father of all. We need not despair of the future of this Republic when it gives to us men of the virtues and qualities possessed by Gen. ESTOPINAL. They will provide our country defenders when its liberties are menaced or its civilization is threatened.

Those who knew him best spoke of his chivalry; his knightly courage; his gentleness and the serenity of his soul; his devotion to duty; his love of home and State and country; his loyalty to the truth as he understood it, and to his ideals, political and moral; his devotion to wife and children; his unfailing friendships; his rich and splendid attainments; of all these fine and splendid qualities which were so molded and integrated as to make of him a truly great and heroic figure; and yet having thus spoken all willingly and lovingly attest the fact that the crown thus fashioned was worthily worn by him.

When I think of men like Gen. ESTOPINAL, I am reminded of the words of President Faunce, who impresses the lesson upon us that the true Christian and the loyal soldier in life's battle is the one who renders service and still greater service. These are his words:

> The good man of the fifteenth century was Thomas á Kempis, whose "Imitation of Christ" has no faintest allusion to any wrongs in this world to be righted. The good man of Bunyan's dream was one who thrust his fingers in his ears to stop the cry of wife and children while he started on his long flight through the world to the celestial abode. But the good man of our time is the one who turns back into the city of destruction and resolves never to leave it until he transforms some portion of it, at least, into the enduring city of God.

And so our friend in the long years of valiant service sought the welfare and the moral advancement of community, State, and Nation. Modest and unassuming, yet he never shrank from responsibility, and with fine courage attacked evils and wrongs intrenched, possessing supreme confidence in the result and in the triumph of the moral forces that in the end will rule the world. There was nothing ostentatious in any of his undertakings, and no protestations of superiority of thought or action, and yet in all that he did he had before his eyes the thought that every duty performed well, every service rendered in the interest of justice, was "ad majorem gloriam Dei."

The Senator from Louisiana has in felicitous terms referred to the family life of Gen. ESTOPINAL, and to his religious faith and his identification with a great religious organization whose influence is felt throughout the world.

I make bold to state that the beauty of the life of this man resulted from his religious faith and from the constant inspiration which it gave to him in all the duties and responsibilities of life. There is something remarkable in the religious faith of the Catholic Church, the faith with which our departed friend was identified. We may not agree with its creed, we may not concur in its doctrines, but there is something commanding and appealing in its record and in its attitude toward the great problems of life, and the soul's welfare, and the momentous issues affecting society, and the present and the future. With sublime faith in its future this great church builds for the ages.

Man is a child of God destined to enjoy immortality and eternal life. The church is God's instrument to lead the erring footsteps of man through sin and over precipitous heights to the kingdom of righteousness and the throne of God.

The home according to the spirit of this faith is a sacred place. The hearthstone is an altar which should be erected to God. Marriage is a sacred union—a religious sacrament which is cognized by God and upon which His benediction is bestowed.

Men and women who sincerely believe they are a part of God, that this life is preparatory to an eternal and glorious one, that it is a part of the eternal plan of an omnipotent and omniscient Father, that marriage is ordained of God, and that the home should be the temple of God, a sanctuary in which purity and righteousness find refuge, that humanity should be bound together in affection as the children of one everlasting Father, that the teachings of the Nazarene should be the rule of conduct and the law of life, that the path of man has always been forward and onward, and that though the processes which evolve a higher civilization are slow, they are persisting—I say men and women who have this faith and who believe that they are linked to this eternal everlasting Father will become and could not be otherwise than forces for righteousness and truth and justice. And societies founded by them of necessity become the repositories of higher forms of justice and righteousness and those spiritual forces which promote civilization. And when throughout the world men and women possess a faith of this character and manifest it in their lives, the millennial day will dawn and "righteousness will cover the earth as waters the mighty deep."

Communities and nations survive only when there is a proper conception of the responsibilities resting upon the individuals and a proper appreciation of the sacredness of marriage and the purity of the home. It is the glory of Christianity that it regards marriage as a sacred ceremonial and a divine union; that it apotheosizes the home life and enjoins upon all within its sacred walls that it is to be a temple erected to the living God from whose sacred precincts are to go forth the young men and women prepared for the serious and solemn responsibilities of life.

There are some in this age of materialism who regard such views as the product of a provincial faith, an intolerable anachronism shocking in this scientific day. Yet, Mr. President, I believe that it were better for mankind if the spirit of Christianity dwelt in the hearts of men, and the divinity of Christ were recognized throughout all the world. Mere intellectualism may not save a people or perpetuate a State. The intellectuals of Greece did not preserve their civilization; yet it has been said that they were as far above the Anglo-Saxon race intellectually as that race is above the African race. Mere intellectualism may go hand in hand with the grossest form of materialism and which eventuates in darkness and moral degradation. Religious pyrrhonism seeks the demolition of the Christian faith, and will inevitably destroy those altruistic qualities which owe their origin and manifestation to spiritual forces which abide in the universe.

Lives of men like Gen. ESTOPINAL bring us back to the fountains of faith and to an appreciation of the teachings of Christ and the faith which He gave to the world. Our departed friend could say with Emerson:

> When I am stretched beneath the pines,
> And the evening star so holy shines,
> I'll laugh at the pomp and the pride of man,
> At the sophist's school, and the learned clan;
> For what are they all, in their high conceit,
> When man in the bush with God may meet?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was a student at the Louisiana State University when I became acquainted with the courtly and attractive Gen. ESTOPINAL. He was then a candidate for lieutenant governor of his State, to which office his people very generously called him. Some of his sons were my schoolmates, and it was during his frequent visits to the university that I first met him. I at once thought him one of the most attractive men I had ever known. Tall, graceful, handsome, and with a countenance always radiant with kindliness and intelligence, with neatness and becoming modesty he dressed, and moved among his fellows with ease and dignity. No matter in what crowd he chanced to be, he was a commanding figure, and these graces grew and remained with him to the end.

I recall now the last time I saw him, leaning upon the sturdy arms of two of his devoted sons. It seemed to me that he was sensitive of even being compelled to accept assistance in carrying himself in his usual and gallant way.

Mr. President, when the silent messenger called Gen. ESTOPINAL from us, earth was made poorer and heaven richer.

When I came to Congress as a young man, representing a district almost adjoining his, with mutual friends and common interests, he immediately took me into his confidence and became, as it were, a father to me. Throughout my career in the other House I was especially fond of him, and frequently sought his counsel. He was never too busy to give it nor so selfish as to withhold it.

Not because he thought too little of women did he love men so much, but his every environment seemed to be with men. Of his 10 children, 9 were boys, as fine a lot of young men as ever sprang from the loins of an illustrious father. No more beautiful picture now comes to me than the constant and devoted care administered by these boys to their father. In his latter years they were his companions, and he was perfectly contented in their company.

I shall not speak of the great services Gen. ESTOPINAL rendered his people, not only in the American Congress but in other high and exalted positions which he had so ably filled; nor shall I speak of the high estimate in which he was held by all his associates who had served with him here, nor of the unbounded love of his constituents. I shall not speak of his undaunted efforts in combating the obstacles of life, nor his heroic acts in peace as well as in war in behalf of the section he loved so well. Suffice to say he, like many another gallant southern gentleman, was as brave as Achilles in time of war and as strong as Hercules in time of peace.

He was as loyal a friend as ever breathed the breath of life, and was as unselfish a patriot as ever served his country. Gentle as a babe and as amiable as any man ought to be, he was yet as firm against those who undertook to do what his conscience would not permit as any man I have ever known. Within his breast beat a heart as true as heaven, as gentle as a woman's, yet as brave as a lion's. True as steel to principle, he was always ready to lift his hand for the oppressed and to strike down the oppressor. But the outstanding characteristics of this gallant man were his courtly manner, his attractive and charming personality, his true and unflagging loyalty.

He was a gentleman; and no higher compliment can be paid any man than to be able to say of him that he was a "gentleman." Next to "mother" and "father" there are no words in all the English language that hold more meaning than "gentleman" and "lady." Customs and behavior change, but a gentleman, in the true acceptation of the term, must always and everywhere and at all times have been the same, for the word could not otherwise fulfill the idea which it conveys and which has been slowly formed throughout the centuries of time.

It is impossible in language to define all that the word "gentleman" embraces, and yet it is clear in its meaning. The farmer's boy may be a gentleman, and so may the earl, but not because one happens to be a peer and the other a lad from the furrow. Cæsar and Napoleon were two of the world's greatest military geniuses. The Roman was a gentleman, the Corsican was not. The Duke of Marlborough and the Father of our Country were two of the world's greatest diplomats. George Washington was a gentleman, but the duke was not.

I like the word "gentleman," and in my humble conception of the word I apply it to my departed friend as the highest compliment that one can pay to another.

Mr. President, Louisiana has a right to be proud of her great men of the past—great statesmen, great soldiers, great jurists, great scientists, great preachers—but she will never boast of any more genial gentleman or loyal son than ALBERT ESTOPINAL, whose dust will enrich her history as the dust of the true and loyal ever does.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, in accordance with a Senate resolution, to-day has been dedicated for memorial services in honor of Gen. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, deceased, late Member of the House of Representatives, who ended a 10-year service and passed to the realms of light on April 28, 1919, at his home in St. Bernard Parish, La. He died surrounded by his family of nine children and the loving companion of more than 50 years.

Four of his sons had volunteered for service on the battle fields of France to uphold the honor of this Republic.

It was a home rich in affection and devotion to the noblest ideals of the great Commonwealth of Louisiana and the Nation.

As a diligent student preparing for a life of usefulness he heard the call to arms. He rushed to a battle whose great aim and scope he little cared to know save that it was for the defense of home and the principles held dear by his kindred. For four long and weary years he endured the hardships, privations, and danger of the private soldier, with the same unflinching courage and fidelity which was the dominating influence that inspired his long, faithful, and worthy service to State and country, and only ended by the call of the Divine Master to come up higher to the endless peace of immortality.

When he returned home at the close of the Civil War he returned among a people many of whom were mourning for the loved ones buried on the battle field. All had become impoverished by the destruction of war. Wreck and ruin were on every hand. He faced a condition which appalled the stoutest hearts. For him it was not to mourn and repine over the calamities and misfortunes which confronted a ruined people. The trying ordeals of the weary march and the dangers of battle had disciplined that unconquerable spirit for the struggle of reconstruction. To rebuild the waste places, to set in orderly fashion a government for the protection of life and property, to insure the peaceful development of the land so blessed by nature, found him a willing soldier and a ready leader.

The people promptly recognized this unflinching courage, sterling integrity, and executive ability, and he was elected sheriff of the parish of St. Bernard. The position in those days was indeed a trying and difficult one. It was no easy task to restore the reign of law and orderly government where chaos and misrule had been the order of the day. His courageous, wise, and efficient administration so impressed the people that he was reelected.

The call for a constitutional convention in 1879 was the absorbing public question. Character, ability, experience in public affairs was needed to frame an organic law for the State under which the energies and thrift of the people, their enterprise and industry, would receive ample protection, security, and incentive to rear a Commonwealth worthy of the great natural resources and the intelligence of a progressive people.

The problems with which the convention was to deal were difficult, more trying than those of ordinary constitutional conventions. The people of St. Bernard, well knowing the experience of their leader, his unselfish devotion to the common welfare, elected him to that convention, which produced a charter of rights, which freed the State from misrule, waste of public finances, abolished special privileges, and provided a safe, economical, and righteous government.

He was a worthy member of that great body of patriots who worked out a beneficial instrument for good government. It was the beginning of Louisiana's rehabilitation, and began that splendid career of prosperity which has made Louisiana one of the brightest stars in the constellation of the Union. He was elected to the State senate, and by his practical and wise counsel aided the adoption of laws for the public welfare. No legislation that was not for the common good ever secured his support. He believed in a government for the people and by the people. He loved children. He believed that a sound system of education was a necessity for the perpetuation of a democracy. He freely gave his services for many years as a member of the board of school directors, a work which required sound discretion and aggressive action to secure funds and to enlist the general public in its behalf.

As lieutenant governor he presided with dignity and courtesy over the deliberations of the senate, and it was while he was serving in that capacity that I became acquainted with him and learned to know the splendid qualities that he possessed. He not only held the esteem and confidence of that body, but their sincere affection. He represented his people in the constitutional convention of 1898.

In 1908 he was chosen as a worthy successor of the faithful and efficient Representative, Gen. Adolph Meyer, who died in the service of his people.

Gen. ESTOPINAL came to the broader field of legislation exceedingly well equipped. The great metropolis of the South, its business affairs, its port, and the legislation for the system of protection from the destructive floods of the mighty Mississippi, were familiar subjects. He had lived with the people; a man of generous mold, he had been in constant contact with the people of every class and condition. He knew well what national legislation had been enacted which touched particularly the people of his district, and what were the greatest needs for further aid to the development of the great seaport whose business interests and whose success were intimately interwoven with the prosperity and development of the Nation.

Gen. Meyer, his predecessor, had for many years been the constant champion of the navy yard at Algiers. It had been closed and dismantled when Gen. ESTOPINAL came to Congress. Fortunately for the Republic, Gen. ESTOPINAL was assigned to the Committee on Naval Affairs. He began immediately with that tact and diplomacy which characterized him to insist not from the mere sectional view that New Orleans must have a navy yard for the benefit of its business interest, but from that broad national viewpoint that the country needed a naval station on the Gulf; that it was necessary for the Navy itself. Gen. ESTOPINAL was not a sectionalist. He loved every inch of soil covered by the Stars and Stripes. The welfare of the Nation was his chief concern. He had a vision that America needed a large Navy. To the south of New Orleans there was an awakening of development among the countries on the Gulf and southern seas. His comprehensive mind saw that maritime commercial development required a large Navy as its helpmate. His wealth of information, his unceasing and forceful presentation, and a persuasive and modest manner convinced his associates on the committee. It was his greatest service to the Nation, for it was indeed a necessity. Shortly afterwards this navy yard became an active factor in the Nation's equipment for the American Navy, which did its full share to bring about the glorious victory that set the millions of Europe free from the oppressive yoke of autocracy.

That kindly, modest, and courtly gentleman late in life won a high place in the esteem, confidence, and affection of his fellow Members in that great popular branch of the foremost legislative body in the world. It is so well expressed by that profound judge of men whose position as Speaker for many years qualified him to give a just appraisement of its Members that I quote here:

He was one of the most dependable of the sons of Adam, and dependableness is one of the most valuable of human characteristics. What he was, he was—honest, honorable, kind, courteous, industrious, faithful as the needle to the pole. He did his duty and did it well in all the relations of life. In every position he ever held he enjoyed the confidence of all who knew him and won both their respect and affection.

At home he was the friend and counselor of those in trouble. His charity and sympathy for those in suffering and distress were only measured by his opportunity and power to aid. For him friendship was more than a name—it meant in his case the noblest impulse of a brave and generous heart. It meant, as expressed by President Wilson in his Manchester speech, "service in the hour of need." Truly he exemplified the words of one of earth's greatest men, "A faithful friend is the true image of the Deity."

His tender affection for his old comrades in arms in the Confederate armies found constant expression in his solicitude for their comfort and pleasure in their declining years. His guiding star in life was the performance of duty to God, home, and country, and that "a good name is rather to be chosen than great riches and loving favor rather than silver and gold."

He has gone to his reward. He leaves for his family, friends, and country a precious legacy more enduring than brass or marble; an inspiration to the youth of the land, that devotion to country, to the betterment of the world, to the building of character is the noblest achievement of man. Louisiana and the Nation have lost a statesman and a gentleman in all that these words imply.

Mr. President, as a further mark of respect, I move that the Senate now adjourn until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Tuesday, June 1, 1920) the Senate adjourned until 8 o'clock p. m., Tuesday, June 1, 1920.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate June 1 (legislative day of May 24), 1920.

SOLICITOR GENERAL.

William L. Frierson to be Solicitor General.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 1, 1920.

The Senate met at 8 o'clock p. m.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. Command upon us at this time, we beseech Thee, Almighty God, Thou King eternal, immortal, invisible, Thy holy spirit of wisdom in all the affairs that shall come before us at this time. May we be guided by Thy spirit, that with unselfish and full devotion to Thy truth in the life and to the triumph of Thy righteousness we may give ourselves to the tasks before us. We pray Thy forgiveness wherein we fail Thee, wherein we sin by blindness, by deafness, by refusing to see and to hear Thy voice and Thy word. Lord, forgive us; guide and bless us. Bless our Nation. Bless the nations of the earth. Bless their leaders. Let Thy mercy, O Lord, be upon the President of our United States. Keep and preserve and bless him, we pray Thee. We commit us to Thee. Lead us, guide us, and at last when the end of life shall come for us upon earth, grant that we may have so lived that we shall receive Thine own blessed "well done." And this we ask, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, May 24, 1920, when, on request of Mr. KENYON and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

FOREST RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting, in response to a resolution of February 21, 1920, certain information relative to timber depletion, lumber prices, lumber exports, and concentration of timber ownership. The Chair will not direct that the communication and accompanying papers shall be printed in the RECORD, or to be printed as a document, unless it is ordered by the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. J. Res. 370. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON IMMIGRATION.

Mr. KEYES, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7930) to provide for the treatment in hospital of diseased alien seamen, reported it with amendments.

Mr. STERLING, from the Committee on Immigration, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11224) to amend the act entitled "An act to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes," approved October 16, 1918, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 648) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. KEYES introduced a bill (S. 4478) to create a Bureau of Aeronautics in the Department of the Navy, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-night it shall adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not hear the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That when the Senate adjourns to-night it shall adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXPENSES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

CHARLES CURTIS,
LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS,
JOHN WALTER SMITH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

C. R. DAVIS,
LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
J. P. BUCHANAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

WOMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13229) to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the women's bureau.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator allow me to call up a bill? If it causes any discussion I shall not press it.

Mr. KENYON. Let my motion be first put.

Mr. THOMAS. Very good.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KING. With the understanding that with the bill before the Senate no other business except by unanimous consent shall be undertaken this evening, I have no objection to the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the measure.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I now yield to the Senator from Colorado.

LANDS IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS. There is a small personal bill relating to certain lands in Colorado which was favorably reported from the Committee on Public Lands this morning and placed on the calendar. It is a bill which for some reason has been overlooked for several months. Representative TIMBERLAKE of my State, who secured its passage in the House, is very anxious to secure its passage here before final adjournment.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 1024) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to John Zimmerman for certain lands in the Colorado National Forest upon the surrender of other lands of an equal acreage also located in the Colorado National Forest, Colo. If it causes any discussion I will withdraw it.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to issue a patent to John Zimmerman for the following-described lands: The north half of the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section 32; the south half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 33, township 9 north, range 74 west of the sixth principal meridian; and the north half of the north half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 4, township 8 north, range 74 west of the sixth principal meridian, upon the transfer by the said John Zimmerman to the United States of the following-described lands: The northeast quarter of the northeast quarter, and the north half of the north half of the southeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 31, township 9 north, range 74 west of the sixth principal meridian: Provided, That upon the reconveyance of the surrendered lands they will become part of the Colorado National Forest, Colo.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WOMEN'S BUREAU.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13229) to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the women's bureau, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with an amendment.

Mr. KENYON. On the bill before the Senate the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] agreed with me that he would not speak if I would not do so. Therefore I will refrain, and ask that the bill may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the women's bureau.

SEC. 2. That the said bureau shall be in charge of a director, a woman, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive an annual compensation of $5,000. It shall be the duty of said bureau to formulate standards and policies which shall promote the welfare of wage-earning women, improve their working conditions, increase their efficiency, and advance their opportunities for profitable employment. The said bureau shall investigate and report to the said department upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of women in industry. The director of said bureau may from time to time publish the results of these investigations in such a manner and to such extent as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe.

SEC. 3. That there shall be in said bureau an assistant director, to be appointed by the Secretary of Labor, who shall receive an annual compensation of $3,500 and shall perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the director and approved by the Secretary of Labor.

SEC. 4. That there is hereby authorized to be employed by said bureau a chief clerk and such special agents, assistants, clerks, and other employees at such rates of compensation and in such numbers as Congress may from time to time provide by appropriations.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Labor is hereby directed to furnish sufficient quarters, office furniture, and equipment, etc., for the work of this bureau.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment of the Committee on Education and Labor was, in section 5, on page 2, line 19, after the word "equipment," to strike out the words "and so forth," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Labor is hereby directed to furnish sufficient quarters, office furniture, and equipment for the work of this bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator having charge of the bill what is the estimated cost to the people of the establishment of this bureau?

Mr. KENYON. If I am not violating my agreement with the Senator from Utah, I will say that there is now a bureau known as the Women's Bureau, in the Department of Labor, established during the war.

Mr. THOMAS. What is the agreement with the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. That if I will not make a speech he will not.

Mr. THOMAS. I would not have the Senator violate that agreement for anything.

Mr. KENYON. I will make the same agreement with the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely want some information.

Mr. KENYON. The sundry civil appropriation bill carries an appropriation of $75,000 for the Women's Bureau. The pending bill carries $8,500, which comes out of the appropriation of $75,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether it is clear that this $8,500 comes out of the appropriation of $75,000?

Mr. KENYON. It is clear to me.

Mr. KING. Has the Senator any objection to making that manifest by an amendment?

Mr. KENYON. That is up to the Committee on Appropriations. The pending bill does not appropriate anything at all. It simply establishes the two offices at $8,500.

Mr. WARREN. As I am not under a promise not to talk, I should like to ask the Senator a question or two.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to make a speech on the bill.

Mr. WARREN. The question propounded by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] interests me because, as the Senator has stated, appropriations have to be made and some one has to take some responsibility and know what is expected and what can be furnished. I remember that we had a children's bureau established on a direct promise—I am glad it was not kept completely, but I should have liked to have had it kept a little nearer—that it would not cost more than $25,000 a year. It now costs us three or four hundred thousand dollars a year, and we have to refuse several hundred thousand dollars more which is each year asked for.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator think the work the Children's Bureau is doing for the children of the country can hardly be estimated in money?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I think they are doing very well.

Mr. KENYON. We appropriate a good deal more for the hog cholera, the boll weevil, and all such things, and it seems to me we ought to take care of the children.

Mr. WARREN. I do not think because they are doing that kind of good work that they should send committees all over the country on junkets.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator on that.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, I expected the Senator to agree with me on that. I wish, as the Senator does, to furnish every facility possible to take care of the young, and certainly we need the assistance of the women, but I should like to have the women themselves, and I should like to have this department, and I should like to have those who propose this, if they can, give us some idea what it is to cost and how broadly this is to be opened up and whether it is to be one of these institutions of entertainment rather than pure, straight instruction.

Mr. KENYON. I know, of course, that every one of these bureaus can be abused. There are nearly 12,000,000 women engaged in this country as wage earners. This is a bureau to study the problems of the women wage earners. I can not say, of course, to what extent it will go.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. We appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation bill $75,000 for a division for women under the Labor Department. They have the money and they are doing the work and, I have no doubt, good work. Why is it that they desire to make this a bureau?

Mr. KENYON. The bureau, if you may call it that, which now exists, has no fixed status. This is to give it a status.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why has it not had a status before this time?

Mr. KENYON. It has no status. It just runs from year to year. This makes it a permanent bureau. What it will cost will depend upon the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is as to having some chief there?

Mr. KENYON. There is a chief there now.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a head of the division, but I do not know that there is a chief.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know that you would call her a chief. There is a most accomplished woman in charge of it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I admit that. We can not criticize it at all, but I wish to know why they want to make it a bureau, because bureaus are very costly. Whenever we create a bureau it quickly expands; and I think in this instance that we could get along better probably and do the work which is necessary to be done more cheaply without establishing a bureau. That is my idea.

Mr. KENYON. The thought of the women is that this legislation will give the bureau a status and a dignity and a standing which is in keeping with their rights and condition in the country. If the Senator will read in the hearings the testimony of Mrs. Bass, who is connected, I think, with the Democratic National Committee in some capacity, he will find a very clear exposition of why the women of the country are asking for the establishment of this bureau. Representatives were at the hearings who claimed that they spoke for about 9,000,000 women in this country. I do not know that they did; but I know that the national committees of the two great parties were represented. The Women's Voters' League, which has a tremendous membership in this country, were represented and they felt that it would give the bureau a status and dignity to make it permanent. That is all there is to it.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Iowa will yield further, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who has just spoken, worked with me up to a late hour last night in connection with the conference committee on the sundry civil bill, which, as he states, and as the Senator from Iowa has stated, carries $75,000 to carry on this work, although not, perhaps, for this particular purpose; yet that amount is wholly for the woman's division.

Mr. KENYON. It would be used for this purpose.

Mr. WARREN. It would be used for the same general purpose. The House bill did not contain that provision when it came to the Senate. It had been placed in the bill there, but went out, I believe, on a point of order.

Mr. KENYON. I think the House passed this particular bill almost unanimously. There were only a few votes against it.

Mr. WARREN. As to the amount of money provided for the bureau, of course, it can hardly be compared to the appropriations for certain divisions, we will say, of the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the amount of money appropriated would hardly be sufficient to justify making it a bureau, with a $5,000 chief and a $3,500 subchief.

Mr. KENYON. It would have to, because it is all the money that has been appropriated.

Mr. WARREN. One moment. I am simply saying that the salaries proposed to be paid for this particular bureau are greater than those in other services of the same size.

Mr. KENYON. The salaries are exactly the same as those paid in the Children's Bureau.

Mr. WARREN. Taking that view of it, I know that was done as to the Children's Bureau, and therefore we have had to appropriate a little more money for it than for any other bureau, because, having paid $5,000 at the top, we had to raise the dignity of that bureau and appropriate many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year more than we had any idea of doing, at least until we knew something of its work and worth.

This bill provides that the bureau shall have a chief clerk, special agents, assistant clerks, and other employees. There is no statement as to what they will cost, but all of them, I assume, the Senator from Iowa expects to cover with the $75,000 that is appropriated.

Mr. KENYON. Section 4 of the bill reads:

> And in such numbers as Congress may from time to time provide by appropriations.

Mr. WARREN. But as appropriations for the bureau will come up every year, and the Senator himself is an honored member of the committee, I think the Senate ought to understand something of what the prospects and expectations are, so that when we want to provide for all needful things under the bureau it may not be held up as something about which we are unduly stingy, if we do not appropriate as much money for it as some other bureau is receiving with a head and with a subhead receiving like salaries.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Wyoming will have to rely on their reasonableness.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to have the Senator state, if he will, what his expectations are as to what will be necessary to conduct this bureau hereafter along the line that he has outlined in his mind.

Mr. KENYON. In the way of employees?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; altogether. The Senator has provided for rather more than employees in the bill, because other expenses will be incurred.

Mr. KENYON. I suppose the amount of the appropriation will increase; it would be idle to claim anything else. The problems with which they will deal will increase. I am unable to say, of course, what the women will ask for this bureau. The Senator from Wyoming has had as much experience as I have as to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of women, but I think he will find them reasonable.

Mr. WARREN. That is the reason why I should like, in the very incipiency of this movement, to know for those who have to provide the means, what the expectation may be; that is all.

Mr. KENYON. I could go ahead and point out what they expect to do and what they have been doing under the bureau as it now exists. In answer to the Senator's question I go back to the language of the bill, which provides:

> It shall be the duty of said bureau to formulate standards and policies which shall promote the welfare of wage-earning women, improve their working conditions, increase their efficiency, and advance their opportunities for profitable employment.

That is the kernel of the bill—anything they can do to promote the welfare of wage-earning women. Here are some of the things they have worked out: The question of seats in industrial establishments, where there are thousands of women working; the question of toilets, of sanitation, of rest rooms, of drinking facilities; guarding against dangerous machinery; protection against dust; fire escapes, and hundreds of other things which enter into the welfare of the wage-earning women.

This bureau has made studies at the request of various States, for instance, a study on wages and conditions of candy makers in Philadelphia; also as to the eight-hour day in Federal and State legislation; night work for women in various factories; women in the Government service. They made a special investigation of the wage-earning women in the factories in Bridgeport, Conn. They also made a similar investigation at the request of the State of Virginia as to the hours and conditions of work for women in industries in Virginia. That is the general line of work which they have been doing. They have not had very large appropriations in the past up to this time; I think they have had only $40,000. The general purpose of the bill is to help in all the problems that may affect at least 12,000,000 wage-earning women in this country and to provide a bureau having in view their welfare. What it will cost will depend upon the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, as a matter of fact, is it not true that this bureau is to do just what they have been doing?

Mr. KENYON. Undoubtedly. They will also standardize the work.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator says that the amount of the appropriations for this bureau will depend on the Appropriations Committee. I have had some little experience with bureaus of the Government. I have heard promises made on their behalf upon the floor of the Senate as to the amount of appropriations they would require. I recall that it was said of one bureau that it would not cost over $25,000 a year, but it is now costing $400,000.

Mr. REED. Which one is that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I refer to the Children's Bureau. So far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, if the Senator depends on them, I am afraid the reliance will not be a strong one, for when we tried to hold down the Children's Bureau, for instance, to an appropriation of $200,000, I think, the Senator from Iowa fought that effort of the committee——

Mr. KENYON. Yes, sir; I fought it and tried to get the appropriation increased, and I am proud of that action.

Mr. OVERMAN. So that the appropriation was increased beyond what the Committee on Appropriations had recommended by $125,000.

Mr. KENYON. Yes, sir; and it should have been raised.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not criticizing the Senator; I am merely telling him of my experience and what has happened heretofore. I am not fighting this bill, although I do not see why the organization covered by it should be made a bureau, for I know how all bureaus after their creation are quickly expanded, as evidenced by the estimates they send in. The budget system may change conditions somewhat; I hope it will; but the Appropriations Committee can not hold these items down, for when the children or the women appeal to the Senate, the Senate will always override the Appropriations Committee. So what the appropriations for the women's bureau will be, no man knows. It is proposed to appropriate $75,000 now. I hope they are doing good work; I think they are, and, I repeat, I am not opposing the bureau; but I wish to warn the Senate that there will be an estimate here next year for over $200,000, and probably some Senator will get up and appeal for the women, and the Senate is just as apt as not to make the appropriation $500,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think they are likely to appropriate any more money for the benefit of the women of this country than some gentlemen are anxious to appropriate for the benefit of the women of Armenia, Europe, Asia, and Africa?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am ready to appropriate any money that may be necessary for the welfare of the children or, if necessary, for the welfare of the women of Armenia to help them; but I do not want extravagance in the governmental departments; and I think there is extravagance in various bureaus, indeed, a great deal of extravagance. The estimates which they send to Congress show that to be the fact, but we can not hold them down. I am just telling the Senator of the experience we have had. I am not fighting the bill of the Senator from Iowa; I stand for the women everywhere—in Armenia and everywhere else—and I want to help them so far as I am concerned——

Mr. KENYON. I hope the women of North Carolina will appreciate the attitude of the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. But I want some expression from the Senator so that we may have the benefit of it in the future when it comes to making appropriations for the women's bureau.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator will get no expression from me to be used in the future as to limiting the cost of any work for the welfare of the women or the children of this country. I will vote for appropriations for such a purpose quite as quickly as for appropriations to eradicate the boll weevil in the South or hog cholera or many similar appropriations which we vote. When the Senate has just voted about $250,000 for free seeds, it ought not to say much about $75,000 for the women of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can not estimate, then, from the provisions of this bill, in view of the powers it confers and the duties it imposes on the women's bureau, how much that bureau is going to cost?

Mr. KENYON. It is going to cost $75,000 this year, and I think it is going to cost more next year, and will eventually cost considerably more.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad the Senator is so candid, and I have endeavored also to be candid in discussing this question, because I am a member of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. If the bureau does not do good work, I will join the Senator in abolishing it, but if it does good work for the women of the country, especially for the women who are toiling in industry and who have not any particular friends to take care of their interests, I shall be here urging that money be appropriated for its maintenance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator upon one or two occasions has been rather severe on the steering committee, of which I am an unfortunate member. I am sure the Senator will recollect that the much-abused steering committee has done its best to see that the women's bureau bill shall be one of the measures to be considered at this session.

Mr. KENYON. I congratulate the steering committee for having given the bill a place on the program, and I thank the Senator from New York for what he has done.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not oppose the passage of this bill, although I shall vote against it. The number of bureaus and other agencies in the various departments is steadily multiplying. Whenever any particular activity reaches a certain stage, application is almost immediately made for its creation as a bureau. They have small beginnings, but it is not long before these bureaus have developed into full bedroom sets. They are the prolific source of other bureaus. I have no doubt this will be the basis for a number of subsidiary bureaus; that is, subsidiary at the commencement, but, as time passes on, each will have a distinct individuality of its own. We are a bureau-governed country. The world may have been made safe for democracy, but this country was long ago made safe for bureaucracy; and the activities of the bureaus are becoming so numerous, and the statutes regulating them and defining the penalty for disregard of their requirements are increasing so rapidly, that it is extremely difficult for the average man to avoid all of the various rules, regulations, and penalties that have been crystallized into statutes by Congress during the progress from the simpler forms of republican government to a bureaucracy.

When I was a boy the old Anglo-Saxon faculty of self-reliance, confidence of the individual in himself, and the assumption that the Government was created by the people for their security and prosperity was the prevailing sentiment. Nowadays the Government is regarded as an institution created and existing for the purpose of doing something for others, and as a consequence every agency and every enterprise which meets with any obstacles during the course of private development now appeals to the United States of America either to take it over or for that amount of assistance which is more than equivalent to the difference between success and failure.

I do not care to say anything more upon the subject, but I want to ascertain, if I can, if there is anybody here who is authorized to speak for the steering committee of the majority, whether it is intended to hold any more night sessions.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator looks at me. I have no right to speak for the steering committee.

Mr. THOMAS. I am looking at the Senator because I always like to look at him.

Mr. KENYON. I hope there will be more night sessions if we are going to adjourn, so that we can complete the business of the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, at the close of a session and during the haste which must attend the transaction of legislative business advantage is always taken, if possible, to jam legislation through Congress which opportunity for a more careful investigation would have made impossible; and I am satisfied that the closing hours of this session will not differ materially from others. I know of a number of measures that are upon the calendar that are very important and perhaps they should be summarily disposed of; but, speaking for one, I do not propose to permit that sort of thing to go on between now and next Saturday night if I can help it, and I sincerely trust that night sessions will not be held. It is difficult to secure quorums. It is very difficult to secure quorums in this body at any time. It is extremely difficult to secure the average attendance of more than 15 or 20 Members of this body at any time. These night sessions interfere very materially with social and other engagements of Senators, who necessarily prefer their enjoyment to the dry and more prosaic duties or senatorial life; and that is just the time when a Senator who has some bill—and I am casting no reflection either upon his motives or upon his bill—finds an opportunity to accomplish legislation which, upon a more careful inspection, we might not feel justified in approving.

Mr. President, I never like to take advantage of people, and so I take this opportunity to say that if I am called here tomorrow night or the next night or the night after the chances are that Senators will find that "I am from Missouri."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on this bill.

I have not agreed with some of the demands that have been made by women; but here is a bill which proposes to establish a machinery which may be of very great assistance to those women of the country who are obliged to earn their living or who do work at various vocations. The objection urged to it is that the organization is to be called a bureau, and that, having been given that name, expense may be attached in the future to carrying on the work.

I am as much opposed to government by bureaucracy as any other man; but is this bureau a bureaucracy within the common acceptation of that term? I think not. I have had occasion to criticize the Department of Labor. I think it far from perfect; and yet I believe the Department of Labor has been a great benefit to this country, taken as a whole, and that if it is properly run and managed it is capable of infinite blessing for the people of the United States—not only for the laborer but for the capitalist and for all classes of people.

When that organization originated, there was merely a commissioner of labor; and when it was proposed to make the head of the Department of Labor a Cabinet position, it was insisted that the expenses would become very great and burdensome. It is true that the expenses have increased enormously, but it is also true that the work of the department has increased enormously; and I repeat that properly managed and run it is capable of infinite blessing.

We are running a Department of Labor; and if we run a Department of Labor, I can not understand why, under modern economic conditions, there should not be a subdepartment or bureau devoting its energies for the benefit of the woman wage earner.

The question of woman's place in the industrial world is one of growing importance. Under old conditions almost every woman lived in her father's house until she was married. Her energies were almost entirely directed to domestic affairs. There was but a small percentage of women who went out into the world to buffet with its tasks. I am not sure but that it would be a very good thing if we could return to old conditions, but that can not be done. I believe most healthy-minded women would vote in favor of it if they could control it by their votes. The fact is, whether it be a pleasant or an unpleasant fact, that ten or twelve million women in the United States are wage earners. The fact further is that because they are women they have at least in some instances been discriminated against. With this vast body of women engaged in industrial employments of various kinds, and with the policy established of a Labor Department, it seems to me beyond reasonable dispute that there should be an organization within the Labor Department headed by a woman to look after those matters which particularly affect the women of the country who are obliged to earn their living.

I have no question but that this is one of the tasks which can be performed better by a woman than by a man. I do not mean, necessarily, that a woman can do better than a man all of the things incident to the protection of the woman worker; but there are some of the duties which she can undoubtedly perform better, simply because she is a woman, and knows woman's nature and woman's disposition and woman's wants.

Now, it will cost some money; but that can be said of every place we create, of every duty we impose, of everything we attempt. The question as to the amount of cost is within the control of the Congresses of the future.

Mr. President, this bill appeals to me because it proposes to do something for the people of the United States. It was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] that another bureau, to look after children, which only asked the modest sum, I think he said, of $40,000 to begin with, is now demanding $400,000 a year, and he held it up before us as a sort of horrible example of expense and waste. Yet I saw the Senator from North Carolina vote, without batting an eye, for an appropriation of a hundred million dollars to be given as an outright benefaction to the people of Europe. I do not criticize him for it, but charity which extends to Europe ought to lap over in this country far enough to cover the necessities of our own people.

I have seen the same distinguished Senator sit here day after day and vote for a League of Nations, the central thought of which is that the United States shall expend its blood, its treasure, and its energies for the benefit of peoples thousands of miles from our coasts, in order to protect them, it may be, against their own wrongs and their own weaknesses.

I saw him vote to-day for an amendment to the Armenian resolution. I think he voted for it; if he did not, many others did, and I am not singling him out as a horrible example, but as a type. I believe he was paired. That amendment proposed to raise $50,000,000 in this country to lend to Armenia to look after Armenian women and children and men. We are constantly told that it is our duty to go out and democratize the world, to reform humanity, to feed the hungry of every land, to clothe the naked of every country, to educate them, and, finally, to force our system of government, or something akin to it, upon them.

All of this is to cost millions of money, thousands of millions of money, and many thousands of millions of money. It is to be done without the slightest hesitation by some of our friends. The spirit of sacrifice is upon them. They anxiously seek the opportunity to take the treasure of the United States and employ it five or six thousand miles from here.

But the minute it is proposed to spend something for the folks at home, for the white women who struggle against adversity and who battle with want, they become very backward and hesitant and economical and parsimonious and impecunious, and each sets himself up as the watchdog of the Treasury and fills the air with the loudest and most inharmonious bayings.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, was there not an amendment suggested to-day, which received quite a substantial vote, to give the President practically a blank check, to spend any amount of money in Armenia?

Mr. REED. I so understood it.

Mr. President, in a moment I shall conclude. Here is a country of 110,000,000 people, growing all too fast. Immense populations have been poured in through our ports. We have not had time to assimilate them. The native population has increased with remarkable rapidity. At the close of the Civil War we had about 38,000,000 people in this country; to-day we have 110,000,000 people. Then the vast area almost from the Mississippi River to the Pacific was unoccupied and unpeopled.

The virgin prairie invited the plowshare of the farmer. The untouched forest stood where it had always stood, free from the ax of man. All these resources were there to draw from. We did not need to observe the care and prudence which is now an absolute necessity.

Then, probably, there were 30 per cent more farmers in proportion to the whole population than there are to-day. Now we have vast cities, with many of the evils arising from congested populations. The time has come in this country to look after the development of the American citizen. The time has come to begin spending money to see to it that children do not go hungry and are not reared in vice, ignorance, and crime. The time has come to make the condition of the wage earner as pleasant, as agreeable, as healthful as possible. The time has come to spend money to teach people how to earn a living and how to live. This bill is framed in the hope that it may assist in producing some of these beneficent results.

It may not work. It will depend altogether upon the character of people who are placed at the head of the bureau. The Department of Agriculture would have been a failure if it had not been originally placed in the hands of men who were wiser in their day and generation than most of the farmer folk. The United States Army will be a failure if the general at its head and the General Staff are incompetent. The Congress will be a failure if there are not some men of ability and some men of patriotism in the Congress.

So it is with every activity we set up. All will depend upon the method of execution. But we can not hope to succeed unless the effort is made, and, Mr. President, I intend to vote for this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, on page 2, line 1, after the word "shall," to insert "have authority to," so that the sentence will read:

The said bureau shall have authority to investigate and report to the said department upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of women in industry.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection whatever to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. KENYON, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KING obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I will yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to ask unanimous consent to call up a bill.

Mr. KING. I think I shall have to object. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 2, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 1, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of light and life, justice and mercy, love and purity, let Thy spirit, we beseech Thee, possess our souls, to guide us in the closing days of the first regular session of the Sixty-sixth Congress, that, with patience, urbanity, efficiency, these Thy servants may discharge the duties devolving upon them to the good of the common weal. In the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 370. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920," approved May 31, 1920.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 6222) to remove a certain tract or lots of land in Cristobal, Canal Zone, from the operation and effect of the Executive order of the President of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the act of Congress of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat., ch. 390, p. 565), in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on May 31, 1920, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 12272. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

RIGHT TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is an extension of remarks by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] on the adjusted pay for service men.

The House so far has refused to give to anyone leave to extend remarks on that subject, but I presume the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER] left the city under the impression that general leave would be given. For that reason I shall not at this time move to correct the RECORD, but I expect to endeavor to get into communication with the gentleman from North Dakota with a view to having the RECORD corrected; and I want to say now——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment. I want to say now that Members ought not to extend their remarks when specific objection has been made.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SINNOTT. In justice to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER], I wish to state that I had a talk with him the other day and he informed me that he intended to extend under leave given him some time ago. As he is not present, I wish to make that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state that not so very long ago I heard the gentleman from North Dakota ask leave to extend his remarks, and leave was granted. I remember that distinctly, because I told him afterwards that I did not object on account of a certain matter.

Mr. BLACK. I do not wish to do the gentleman from North Dakota any injustice, and if these gentlemen remember the facts correctly, of course I gladly stand corrected. I was assuming that the gentleman from North Dakota had extended his remarks after the speech that he made Saturday afternoon on the bill then before the House, and that was what I called attention to.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from North Dakota casually mentioned the matter to me.

Mr. BLACK. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman will notice that this extension is of a speech delivered in the House on Saturday, May 29. It could not as a matter of right be printed as of that date under a prior leave given.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman from Illinois is correct as to his statement of the rules of the House.

Mr. BEE. May I ask the gentleman from Texas also whether he thinks the word "applause" at the close of the speech should be stricken from the RECORD. I doubt if there was any applause.

Mr. BLACK. Without taking the time of the House any further, I will look into the matter and later bring it to the attention of the House.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be in accord with the proprieties for gentlemen who obtained general leave prior to consideration of the bonus bill to extend their remarks now on that bill. There is objection to it. There is determined objection that there shall not be unanimous consent for the extension of remarks upon the bonus bill. It would be unfair to Members of the House who desire to extend their remarks upon that bill for those who heretofore have obtained general leave to utilize that leave and extend upon a subject that was not then before the House, and had not been considered.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman will readily see that, whether they extend or not, they can not extend under date of last Saturday.

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly not. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, in view of the known opposition to the extension of remarks upon this subject, I think that gentlemen hereafter who ask permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD should make it perfectly clear that they are not seeking, either directly or indirectly, to print remarks on the bonus bill. I am not accustomed to making objections to gentlemen extending their remarks. Very few times have I ever done so; but I do intend to object, and I wish I could now make an objection which would remain throughout the rest of this session to any extension of remarks upon that bonus bill. I intend to object to that, and a number of other gentlemen do; and, in order to avoid any embarrassment of having to inquire of gentlemen what they desire to extend upon, I wish to say that I hope Members who ask consent to extend their remarks will state on what subject they propose to extend them, and will distinctly understand that if they do extend upon this bonus bill, directly or indirectly, without specific authority, they will subject themselves to the proposition of a motion to strike their remarks from the RECORD.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for a moment?

Mr. BLACK. If I have the floor, yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I want to suggest that this matter of extension seems to give rise to abuse unless there is constant objection made. Within a few days I have noticed an extension in the RECORD of a purely personal political document by a Member of this House. Owing to his absence, I will not mention his name, but it is a purely political document, that never should have any place in the RECORD. I investigated the RECORD of the date assigned to that document and I was unable to find under that date any permission given the gentleman to extend for any purpose. Now, it would seem to me that at least the House has the right to have a date assigned that will enable us to verify the leave given. In the case I have in mind I have not been able to find that any leave was given. The insertion was a gross abuse of the privileges of the House.

Mr. BLACK. I agree with the gentleman that Members ought to get specific leave before they take the liberty of extending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to suggest that the Chair thinks whenever a Member extends remarks he should extend them as of the date when the permission was granted.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 370) to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920.

Resolved, etc., That the provision of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved May 31, 1920, which reads as follows: "That hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one-half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton standard grades of the United States from the grades of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton standard grades as established in said act," be, and the same is, hereby repealed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution has reference to the so-called Comer amendment. Through some oversight or error in enrolling the bill, that amendment was included in the bill as it was signed by the Speaker and the Vice President and approved by the President. As will be recalled, the Senate receded from its disagreement on their amendment to the bill. As I have stated, through some oversight or error in the enrollment of the bill, this Comer amendment was included, when it had no place there. This joint resolution is offered simply to repeal that part of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the conference report on the bill H. R. 13108, the naval appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the conference report on the naval appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 7, 8, 12, 14, 17, 19, 21, 25, 26, 27, 29, 35, 36, 55, 56, 57, 58, 68, 69, 72, 74, 75, 77, 81, 86, 88, 91, 92, 93, 100, 102, 103, 104.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 15, 16, 18, 20, 23, 34, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 66, 70, 71, 73, 76, 79, 83, 84, 89, 90, 94, 96, 97, 98, 101, 105, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$3,883,400"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, is hereby directed to furnish to the proper officers in the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia of the United States, on or before June 30, 1921, statements of the services of all persons from those several places who served in the Navy during the War with Germany, and for that purpose a sum not to exceed $200,000 is hereby appropriated for obtaining the necessary material and the employment of the necessary clerical force, and the further sum of $100,000 shall be allotted of the appropriation of $404,140 for temporary employees, Bureau of Navigation, contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921: Provided, That no part of the said appropriation of $404,140, or of the appropriation of $200,000 herein made, shall be used for the pay of any employee who is engaged on other than work of the Bureau of Navigation."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 24: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "two persons"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$1,200,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$850,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$300,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following "$275,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$600,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$575,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish at two of the permanent naval training stations experimental summer schools for boys between the ages of 16 and 20 years. For this purpose he is authorized to use such buildings, or other accommodations, at such training stations; to loan any naval equipment necessary for such purposes, and to give instructions which will fit them for service in the Navy of the United States. He is empowered to establish and enforce such rules within the camp as may be necessary and to detail such members of the naval personnel as may be required in order to encourage and execute the spirit of this act. The Secretary of the Navy is further authorized to loan the necessary naval uniforms during the period of training and to furnish subsistence, medical attendance, and other necessary incidental expenses for those attending these schools: Provided, That those under instruction, with the consent of their parents or their guardians, shall enroll in the Naval Reserve Force for not less than three months, and no person not so enrolled shall be admitted to said training schools. For carrying out the provisions of this paragraph the sum of $200,000 is appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"Provided further, That, until June 30, 1922, of the Organized Militia as provided by law, such part as may be duly prescribed in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall constitute a Naval Militia; and, until June 30, 1922, such of the Naval Militia as now is in existence, and as now organized and prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy under authority of the act of Congress approved February 16, 1914, shall be a part of the Naval Reserve Force, and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to maintain and provide for said Naval Militia as provided in said act: Provided further, That upon their enrollment in the Naval Reserve Force, and not otherwise, until June 30, 1922, the members of said Naval Militia shall have all the benefits, gratuities, privileges, and emoluments provided by law for other members of the Naval Reserve Force; and that, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, duty performed in the Naval Militia may be counted as active service for the maintenance of efficiency required by law for members of the Naval Reserve Force: And provided further, That all moneys appropriated for the Naval Reserve Force or for the Naval Militia shall constitute one fund and hereby are made available, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for both."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "$200,000" and in lieu thereof insert the following: "$100,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 65, 67, 78, 80: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 65, 67, 78, 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendments and in lieu thereof insert, on page 20, after line 6, the following:

"That a special joint committee is hereby created, to be composed of five Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The committee shall investigate the advisability of establishing, developing and maintaining a naval base on San Francisco Bay or the waters tributary thereto. The committee shall prepare comparative estimates of the cost of acquiring, establishing, developing, and maintaining such sites and shall report to the Congress of the United States not later than December 31, 1920, the result of its investigation, together with such other recommendations, estimates, and information as it deems proper, including information concerning a deeper channel to Mare Island Navy Yard and a sufficient water basin at Mare Island.

"That said committee shall also investigate and report in like manner as to the advisability and cost of establishing an aviation base at Sand Point, King County, Wash.; a submarine base at Los Angeles Harbor (San Pedro), Calif.; and a submarine, destroyer and aviation base at Port Angeles, Wash.

"That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to detail such technical experts to assist the committee as the committee may request.

"That the expenses of said committee shall be paid, one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives and one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof; and for the cost of borings and the procuring and collating of all other technical data in connection with such investigation, there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $50,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 82: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following: "$10,751,950"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 85: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 85, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his or her own misconduct, of any officer, enlisted man, or nurse on the active list of the Regular Navy or Regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child, to any other dependent relative of such officer, enlisted man, or nurse previously designated by him or her, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer, enlisted man, or nurse at the date of his or her death. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man or nurse having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his or her death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the pay of the Navy and pay of the Marine Corps, respectively: Provided, That nothing in this section or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this section applicable to officers, enlisted men, or nurses of any forces of the Navy of the United States other than those of the Regular Navy and Marine Corps, and nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or probationary appointments in the Regular Navy or Marine Corps: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall apply to the officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard, and the Secretary of the Treasury will cause payment to be made accordingly."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 87: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 87, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"That the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall have the relative rank, pay, and allowances of a captain in the Navy, and that hereafter he shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from the list of commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey not below the rank of commander for a term of four years, and may be reappointed for further periods of four years each."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 99: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 99, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"The authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is hereby permanently established at 27,400, distribution in the various grades to be made in the same proportion as provided under existing law: Provided, That all officers serving temporarily in the grades of captain and below upon the date of the passage of this act shall be eligible to fill existing vacancies and those hereby created in the permanent authorized strength in said grades by transfer to or reappointment in the permanent Marine Corps in the grades not above that of captain. Transfers so made shall be without regard to age, and if found not qualified for transfer to the same grade as that held by them on the date of transfer then to lower grades after qualification. All officers so transferred shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, under such rules as he may prescribe, their mental, moral, professional, and physical qualifications to perform the duties of the grade to which transferred or reappointed and shall take precedence with each other and with other officers of the Marine Corps in such order as may be recommended by a board of marine officers and approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That all persons who served honorably as officers in the Marine Corps or Marine Corps Reserve on active duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and the date of the passage of this act and who have been honorably discharged or assigned to inactive duty shall be eligible for permanent appointment in the same or a lower rank than that held on discharge or assignment to inactive duty, but not above the rank of captain, to fill vacancies existing or hereby created in the permanent authorized strength of the Marine Corps under the same conditions as those above prescribed for officers now in the service: Provided further, That officers now holding temporary commissions in the Marine Corps and who have had more than 10 years' service therein, if not found qualified for permanent commissions, and who are recommended by the board herein provided for, may be appointed warrant officers in the Marine Corps; and the authorized number of warrant officers is hereby increased by a number not to exceed 50 to provide for the appointment of the aforesaid officers: Provided further, That all transfers and appointments made in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be accomplished by June 30, 1921: Provided further, That the officers now holding temporary appointments as commissioned officers in the Marine Corps may retain their temporary commissions until the permanent appointments provided for in the foregoing section shall have been made."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 106: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 106, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ on active duty, with their own consent, members of the Naval Reserve Force in enlisted ratings, the number so employed not to exceed during any fiscal year the average of 20,000 men: Provided, That the number of naval reservists, so employed on active duty, together with the total number of enlisted men in the Regular Navy, shall not exceed the total enlisted strength of the Navy as authorized by law: Provided further, That such members of the Naval Reserve Force so employed shall serve on active duty for not less than 12 nor more than 18 months unless sooner released: Provided further, That hereafter no person shall be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force except for general service: And provided further, That the number of commissioned officers of the line, permanent, temporary, and reserve on active duty shall not exceed 4 per cent of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Regular Navy, and the number of staff officers on active duty of whatever kind shall be in the same proportions as authorized by existing law: Provided further, That 500 reserve officers are also authorized to be employed in the aviation and auxiliary service: And provided further, That, until December 31, 1921, temporary appointments now existing may be continued in force in any grade or rank, not to exceed the number allowed in any grade or rank based upon the total permanent authorized commissioned strength of the line or of any staff corps; and, within the limitations herein prescribed, officers of the Naval Reserve Force may, with their own consent, be continued on active duty ashore or afloat, including three on shore duty in the Historical Section of the Office of Naval Intelligence, who may be retained on active duty beyond the age of disenrollment but not beyond June 30, 1922: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as reducing the permanent commissioned or enlisted strength of the Regular Navy as authorized by existing law.

"That all officers of the Naval Reserve Force and temporary officers of the Navy who have heretofore incurred or may hereafter incur physical disability in line of duty shall be eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided by law for officers of the Regular Navy who have incurred physical disability in line of duty.

"SEC. 3. That officers holding temporary commissioned and warrant ranks in the Navy and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks shall be eligible for transfer to an appointment in the permanent grades or ranks in the Navy for which they may be found qualified not above that held by them on the date of transfer, but not to exceed a total of 1,200 commissioned officers in the line, of which number 500 may be appointed from class 5, Naval Reserve Flying Corps, with proportionate number in all Staff Corps as now authorized by law, except that the Medical, Dental, and Supply Corps shall be entitled to such additional numbers as are necessary to make up the full quota of officers in those corps, as now authorized by law: Provided, That officers so appointed to the line of the Navy shall take rank in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank, and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks found qualified for a given rank shall be arranged according to their precedence among themselves and commissioned in the permanent service next after the lowest temporary officer who qualifies for the same rank and is appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act:

"Provided further, That included in the number of transfers and appointments hereinbefore allowed, commissioned officers of the Coast Guard, who have served creditably under the Navy Department in the War with the German Government, upon suitable application approved by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of the Treasury, may be appointed to a permanent rank or grade in the Navy for which found qualified by a board of naval officers under the provisions of existing law, but not above the rank of lieutenant commander, and shall take such precedence therein as the Secretary of the Navy may determine: Provided further, That for the purposes of computing longevity pay and retirement privileges of officers and enlisted men of the Navy, all creditable service in the Coast Guard and former Revenue-Cutter Service shall be counted.

"SEC. 4. That in addition to the number of transfers and appointments hereinbefore allowed, commissioned warrant officers of more than 15 years' service since date of warrant or date of first appointment as paymaster's clerk, pharmacist or mate, who have creditably served in the war with the German Government in temporary commissioned ranks or grades in the regular Navy, shall be appointed to a permament rank or grade for which they may be qualified as established and shown by their records of service during their term of service not above the temporary rank or grade held by them at the time of transfer: Provided, That officers so transferred to the line of the Navy shall take rank therein in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank: Provided further, That all officers so transferred in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of this act to the staff corps of the Navy shall take precedence with each other and with other officers in the Navy in such order as may be recommended by a board of naval officers and approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That no transfers or appointments made in accordance with sections 3 and 4 of this act shall be to a higher grade or rank than lieutenant in the Navy: And provided further, That officers appointed to the permanent Navy in accordance with the foregoing sections who now hold permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant rank in the United States Navy shall, if they thereafter fail professionally on examination for promotion, revert to such permanent warrant or permanent commissioned warrant status.

"SEC. 5. That officers appointed under any of the foregoing provisions shall be not more than 35 years of age when so appointed to the line of the Navy, Construction Corps, or Supply Corps, and not more than 43 years of age when so appointed to the Corps of Chaplains, or to the Medical, Dental, or Civil Engineering Corps: Provided, That said age limits shall be increased in the cases of officers who have rendered prior service as paymaster's clerks, or as mates, or as warrant or commissioned officers in the naval service to the extent of all prior naval service: Provided further, That officers originally appointed to the Dental Corps above the said age limits shall be eligible for appointment and promotion under this act irrespective of age: And provided further, That officers of the line of the Navy who are appointed thereto pursuant to this act from sources other than the Naval Academy shall not be ineligible for promotion by reason of age as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 579), until they have rendered 10 years' service in the grade of lieutenant commander, 6 years' service in the grade of commander, or 8 years' service in the grade of captain, respectively, upon the completion of which service such officers, if then ineligible for promotion by reason of age, shall be retired in accordance with said act: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, promotions to lieutenant (junior grade) and lieutenant may be made without regard to length of service: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, officers of the permanent Navy who have served satisfactorily during the war with the German Government in a temporary grade or rank shall be eligible under the provisions of existing law for selection for promotion or for promotion to the same permanent grade or rank without regard to statutory requirements other than age and professional and physical examination: And provided further, That in making reductions in rank as may be required by this act, officers holding temporary appointments may be given temporary appointments in lower grades, and officers so appointed shall take precedence from the dates of their original appointments in such lower grades.

"SEC. 6. That in case any enlisted man or enrolled man who, since the 11th day of November, 1918, has been or hereafter shall be discharged from any branch or class of the naval service for the purpose of reenlisting in the Navy or Marine Corps or heretofore has extended or hereafter shall extend his enlistment therein, he shall be entitled to the payment of the $60 bonus provided in section 1406 of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes,' approved February 24, 1919, and to travel pay as authorized in section 3 of the act enitled 'An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions,' approved February 28, 1919: Provided, That only one bonus shall be paid to the same person.

"SEC. 7. That hereafter enlistments in the Navy and in the Marine Corps may be for terms of two, three, or four years, and all laws now applicable to four-year enlistments shall apply, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to enlistments for a shorter period with proportionate benefits upon discharge and reenlistment: Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to establish such grades and ratings as may be necessary for the proper administration of the enlisted personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps.

"SEC. 8. That section 125 of the act entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes,' approved June 3, 1916, shall hereafter be in full force and effect as originally enacted, notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled 'An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions,' approved February 28, 1918: Provided, That the words 'or the Secretary of the Navy' shall be inserted immediately after the words 'the Secretary of War' wherever those words appear in section 125 of the act approved June 3, 1916, hereinbefore referred to.

"SEC. 9. That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, withhold any part or all of the retainer pay which may be due a member of the Naval Reserve Force where such members fail to perform such duty as may be prescribed by law for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided, That any money so withheld shall be credited to the appropriation for organizing and administering the Naval Reserve Force to be used for any purpose that the Secretary of the Navy may consider proper to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided further, That hereafter the minimum amount of active service required for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall be the same as for the Naval Reserve.

"SEC. 10. That the age limits for promotion by selection, which, under existing law, will become effective on June 30, 1920, are hereby deferred until June 30, 1921, in the cases only of those officers who may request such deferment."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, submit the following statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report, namely:

Of the Senate amendments agreed to by the managers on the part of the House, the following are merely changes of totals, namely: 51, 53, 60, 62, and 82.

Of the amendments of the Senate agreed to by the managers on the part of the House, the following involve simply the clarification of language, or the correction of clerical errors, and do not materially change the substance of the bill, to wit: 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 15, 16, 18, 20, 23, 54, 83, 84, 89, and 90.

On amendment No. 3: Increases the appropriation "Pay, miscellaneous," from $3,550,000 to $5,332,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 7 and 8: In the item "Investigation of fuel oil," alter the phrase "and the temporary employment of civilian experts and assistants" to read "and the employment of civilian experts and assistants at Washington, D. C., and elsewhere"; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 9: Increases from $30,000 to $50,000 the appropriation for "Investigation of fuel oil," and contains a proviso designed to provide the necessary machinery for the operation of the naval oil reserves, so that offset wells may be drilled for the protection of the Government's reserves against drainage from adjacent lands and to supply oil for the Government's needs; and the House recedes with an amendment, reinserting the original figures in the appropriation, $30,000, and also inserting a minor change in the language of the proviso.

On amendments Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, and 19: These amendments concern the appropriation for naval aviation, and increase the same by $9,124,000 (or to $25,000,0000). The House recedes from its disagreement to amendments Nos. 10, 11, and 13 and agrees with amendments, the effect of which is to provide a total increase of $4,124,000, making the appropriation for naval aviation $20,000,000. This increase is itemized as follaws: For necessary aircraft, $419,000; for new construction of facilities at stations, to be expended largely upon development on the west coast and in Hawaii, $3,705,000. The Senate recedes from amendments 12, 14, 17, and 19.

On amendment No. 21: Adds to the items specified under the appropriation, "Bureau of Navigation, transportation and recruiting," the following: "rental, maintenance, operation, exchange, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use"; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 22: Directs the Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, to furnish to the several States the records of services of all persons from those States who served in the Navy during the late war, and carries an appropriation of $300,000 for that purpose. The House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount of the appropriation to $200,000, but making available additionally $100,000 from the appropriation for temporary employees, Bureau of Navigation, contained in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921; also inserting a minor change in language.

On amendment No. 23: In the appropriation "Recreation for enlisted men": Strikes out the item "and for such other purposes of like character as the Secretary of the Navy may deem advisable"; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 24: Provides, under the appropriation "Recreation for enlisted men," that not more than five persons shall be employed at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum; and the House recedes with an amendment placing the limitation at "two" persons, instead of five, as authorized in the Senate amendment.

On amendment No. 25: Increases the appropriation for "Gunnery and engineering exercises" from $100,000 to $150,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendments Nos. 26 and 27: In the provisions relating to "Outfits on first enlistment," these amendments change the phrase covering "the uniform gratuity paid to officers of the Naval Reserve Force" to read as follows: "and the uniform gratuity paid to members of the Naval Reserve Force, which shall not exceed $100 for the first enrollment or $30 for any subsequent enrollment of enrolled (enlisted) men." This would change existing law and very materially enlarge the gratuities thereby provided; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 28: Increases from $500,000 to $1,200,000 the appropriation "Instruments and supplies," which includes gyrocompasses on ships and similar equipment; and the House recedes with an amendment making the amount of the appropriation $850,000 instead.

On amendment No. 29: Increases from $125,000 to $250,000 the appropriation for maintenance of the naval training station at Goat Island, Calif.; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 30: Increases the appropriation for maintenance of the naval training station, Newport, R. I., from $250,000 to $300,000; and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the figure to $275,000.

On amendment No. 31: Increases the appropriation for maintenance of the naval training station, Great Lakes, from $500,000 to $600,000; and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount to $575,000.

On amendment No. 32: Increases the appropriation for maintenance of the naval training station, Hampton Roads, Va., from $300,000 to $500,000; and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount to $375,000.

On amendment No. 33: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to establish at each of the four permanent naval training stations summer schools for boys between the ages of 16 and 20 years, and appropriates $375,000 for that purpose; and the House recedes with an amendment permitting the establishment of such schools at two of said training stations as an experiment, and reducing the amount of the appropriation therefor to $200,000.

On amendments Nos. 34 and 37: Include the Naval Militia within the appropriation for the expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve Force; and provide also that, until June 30, 1922, such of the Naval Militia as now is in existence and as now organized under the act approved February 16, 1914, shall be a part of the Naval Reserve Force and shall be maintained and provided for as prescribed in said act. As to amendment No. 34, the House recedes; and as to amendment No. 37, the House recedes from its disagreement and agrees with an amendment which changes the phraseology, but does not alter the substance of the proviso.

On amendment No. 35: Increases the appropriation for organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve Force from $50,000 to $500,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 36: Qualifies with the expression "except in case of emergency" the provision prohibiting the use of any money for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 38: Inserts an appropriation of $200,000 for the maintenance of receiving barracks; and the House recedes with an amendment reducing the amount appropriated to $100,000.

On amendments Nos. 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, and 52: Increase, severally, the pay of the various employees at the Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa., and alter the number employed in certain classes of employees; and also increase, by $5,000, the amount authorized for the maintenance of the home. All sums provided for in these amendments are paid out of the income from the naval pension fund, and do not in any way affect the amount of the appropriations carried in the bill. The House recedes.

On amendment No. 55: Authorizes the use of $100,000 of the appropriation for "Ordnance and ordnance stores" for drafting and technical force to be employed in the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department at Washington, D. C.; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 56: Inserts an appropriation of $200,000 for the torpedo station, Newport, R. I., for labor and material, general care, etc; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 57: Increases the appropriation for "Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks" from $6,500,000 to $9,000,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 58: Inserts an appropriation of $300,000 for accessories and equipment for the Commonwealth dry dock at the navy yard, Boston, Mass.; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 59: Inserts an appropriation of $100,000 for two cranes for building slips at the New York Navy Yard; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 61: Inserts an appropriation of $100,000 for two cranes for building slips at the Philadelphia Navy Yard; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 63: Inserts appropriation of $50,000 for crane for building slip, and appropriation of $250,000 to continue water-front improvements at the Norfolk Navy Yard; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 64: Inserts an appropriation of $75,000 for a distilling plant at the naval station, Key West, Fla.; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 65. Inserts an appropriation of $1,000,000 toward the establishment of a docking and repair plant on San Francisco Bay, and provides that a naval board, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, shall advise and report to Congress not later than November 15, 1920, as to which of three proposed sites should be selected therefor; and the House recedes with an amendment eliminating the appropriation and providing for a special joint committee, composed of five Members of the Senate appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker, to investigate the entire matter as well as the desirability of the several proposed sites, and to report thereon to Congress not later than December 31, 1920; and the said committee is also to investigate and report upon other projects on the west coast proposed in the Senate amendments numbered 67, 78, and 80; the expenses of said committee to be paid from the contingent funds of Senate and House, and for the cost of borings and the procuring and collating of all other technical data in connection with the investigation an appropriation of $50,000 is made.

On amendment No. 66: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make an exchange of certain lands heretofore used in connection with the naval radio station at South San Francisco, Calif., and provides an appropriation of $6,000 to cover the necessary expenses, including compensation for dismantling the radio mast and terminating existing lease; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 67: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to accept from King County, Wash., a certain tract of land for use as an aviation base at Sand Point, Wash.; and the House recedes with the amendment set forth under amendment No. 65, providing for an investigation and report on the proposal.

On amendment No. 68: Inserts an appropriation of $190,000 for joint Army and Navy water-supply system for Fort Kamehameha and Ford Island, Hawii; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 69: A change in totals, made unnecessary by the action on amendment No. 68; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 70: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to make an exchange of lands at the Puuloa Rifle Range Reservation, Pearl Habor, Hawaii; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 71: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to exchange certain land now part of naval station property at Honolulu for land northeast of naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 72: Inserts an appropriation of $50,000 for pontoon for floating derrick at naval station, Olongapo, P. I.; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 73: Authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to construct a hospital building at Olongapo, P. I., at a cost not exceeding $75,000, to provide which amount the proceeds to be derived from the sale of the U. S. S. Repose are made available to that extent; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 74: Inserts an appropriation of $1,050,000 for fuel-oil storage at Puget Sound, Wash., and an appropriation of $1,000,000 for fuel-oil storage at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 75: Change of total, made unnecessary by action on No. 74; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 76: Makes immediately available the sum appropriated for sanitation purposes at the naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va.; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 77: Inserts an appropriation of $60,000 for railroad connections at naval hospital, Las Animas, Colo.; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 78: Provides an appropriation of $500,000 toward the development of a submarine base in Los Angeles Harbor (San Pedro), Calif., and authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to accept title to certain land for use in connection therewith; and the House recedes with an amendment eliminating the appropriation and proviso and providing for an investigation and report on the proposal as set forth under amendment No. 65.

On amendment No. 79: Inserts an appropriation of $50,000 toward the completion of a submarine base at New London, Conn.; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 80: Provides an appropriation of $100,000 toward the development of a submarine, destroyer, and aviation base at Port Angeles, Wash., and the House recedes with an amendment eliminating the item and providing for an investigation and report on the project, as set forth under amendment No. 65.

On amendment No. 81: Increases the appropriation for "Repairs and preservation at navy yards" from $3,000,000 to $4,000,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 85: Restores the law repealed by the war-risk insurance act of October 6, 1917, providing for the payment of a gratuity equal to six months' pay to the widow or dependent relatives of any officer or enlisted man dying in the service from wounds or disease incurred in line of duty, and the House recedes with amendments making minor changes in language and adding the proviso (shown in amendment No. 88) extending the benefits of the section to officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard.

On amendment No. 86: Provides for the restoration to active duty with full pay and allowances and on his own application of any officer or enlisted man on the retired list, and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 87: Provides that the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall receive the rank and pay of a captain in the Navy and be appointed for a term of four years, and the House recedes with amendment making minor change in wording.

On amendment No. 88: Inserted here through clerical error and is covered in the House amendment to amendment No. 85. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 91: Under the appropriation for "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," provides for the use of $95,000 from the "Proceeds of sales" for pay of necessary employees in the Navy Department in connection with salvage and disposition of excess stocks; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 92: Increase the appropriation for "Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," from $10,500,000 to $12,500,000; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 93: Authorizes the use of $75,000 of the appropriations provided under the item "Fuel and transportation" for "technical and clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere"; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 94: Increases the appropriation for "Construction and repair of vessels" from $30,000,000 to $31,000,000; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 95: Under the appropriation for "Engineering" enlarges the item "Maintenance and operation of coast-signal service" so as to include the purchase of land necessary for radio shore stations; and the House recedes with an amendment altering the phraseology and placing a limit of $20,000 on such expenditures.

On amendment No. 96: Increases from $2,250,000 to $2,500,000 the limitation upon expenditures for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, etc., under the Bureau of Steam Engineering; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 97: Increases from $28,000,000 to $29,050,000 the appropriation for repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery on naval vessels, etc.; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 98: Increases from $275,000 to $385,000 the appropriation for the pay of professors and others at the Naval Academy, which increase was provided in the pay bill (H. R. 11927) approved May 18, 1920; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 99: Provides for the establishment at 27,400 of the authorized, permanent strength of the Marine Corps and also provides legislation necessary for the transfer to the permanent service, up to the authorized strength, of those officers who served in temporary grades or as reserves during the late war; and the House recedes with an amendment inserting qualifying provisos, but retaining the substance of the original provisions.

On amendment No. 100: Increases the appropriation for temporary employees at Marine Corps headquarters and at Marine Corps posts from $100,000 to $145,852; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 101: Provides for the use of $318,000 of the unexpended balances in existing appropriations for the current fiscal year, for "Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps," to replace with cast-iron piping the wood conduit which furnishes the Marine Corps base at Quantico, Va., with its water supply; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 102: Increases from $48,000,000 to $52,000,000 the appropriation for "Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery"; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 103: Inserts an appropriation of $11,700,000 for the completion and fitting out, from fabricated material on hand at the Hog Island plant of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, of seven type B vessels as aviation and destroyer tenders; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 104: Change in totals, rendered unnecessary by the action on amendment No. 102; and the Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 105: Increases the limit of cost of hospital ship No. 1 from $3,250,000 to $4,355,000, but does not affect the amount of the appropriation carried in the bill; and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 106: Embodies sections numbered 2 to 10, inclusive, authorizing the employment on active duty, with their own consent, of members of the Naval Reserve Force, to a number not exceeding 20,000, and in no event exceeding the total authorized enlisted strength of the Navy; providing for the transfer to the permanent Navy, but within the total authorized limit in numbers, of certain temporary and reserve officers; providing for the payment of the $60 bonus and travel pay to persons in the naval service to whom it had been denied because of their immediate enlistment therein; making permanent the provisions of the act of July 11, 1919, relating to the terms of enlistment in the Navy; amending section 125 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, so as to make it applicable to naval matters of similar import; providing for the withholding of the retainer pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force who fail to perform the duty prescribed for them by law; and providing, lastly, that the age limits for promotion by selection which under existing law become effective on June 30, 1920, are deferred until June 30, 1921; and the House recedes with divers amendments inserting qualifying provisos and clarifying the phraseology, but retaining the substance of the legislation.

The bill as originally passed carried appropriations aggregating $425,289,574. The amendments of the Senate added to this amount $41,962,852; but in conference the amount of this increase was reduced to $7,990,000, so that, as agreed to by the committee of the conference, the bill carries appropriations totaling $433,279,574.

THOMAS S. BUTLER,
PATRICK H. KELLEY,
FRED A. BRITTEN,
L. P. PADGETT,
D. J. RIORDAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the House to the last paragraph of the statement? The Senate amendments increased the appropriations for the naval service by something over $42,000,000. After six days of hard work we succeeded in reaching an agreement with the Senate conferees. The Senate amendments to the bill as it passed the House increased the amount by seven or eight millions of dollars. That increase, in my judgment, is very large. If you gentlemen have ever been in a conference, you will know the difficulty one has in enforcing upon others his own views; and, indeed, he may be wrong and those differing with him right.

I think your conferees on the part of the House felt that seven or eight million dollars was a good deal of money to add to the bill. It is made up of four items. There is $4,000,000 for aviation. The Senate asked for an increase of $10,000,000, and we receded on $4,000,000 for aviation. That is one of the subjects of which I know but little about, and I deal largely with it as I do with the sick and disabled people—rather lean toward its side in order that aviation may be developed.

Gentlemen will see that that largely accounts for the increase—$4,000,000 for aviation, and that is to be employed largely on the west coast, together with the improvement of aviation in the Sandwich Islands.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. To what particular part of aviation development is the $4,000,000 to be devoted? I am somewhat interested in that.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the gentleman to turn to the House bill, where the items under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] are made for the appropriation for aviation. [At this point some disturbance occurred in the galleries.]

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think the Speaker ought to order the galleries absolutely cleared.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House will take their seats.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker be authorized to order the Sergeant at Arms to clear the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the Speaker already has that authority.

Mr. MONDELL. The regular order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I think we can proceed with the business of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I think, Mr. Speaker, we ought to have the galleries cleared.

Mr. TAGUE. I protest against the clearing of the galleries.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that the Members of the House preserve order, and the Chair notifies the galleries that in case there is any further disturbance the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], if he will turn to the disposition of the moneys appropriated by the House in its bill as originally reported, he will find the distribution of the amount of money appropriated for aviation in items which were added to in the bill, made largely in accordance with the directions laid down by the House.

I have accounted for $4,000,000 of the amount of money which the conferees have agreed to. We also agreed to increase the construction and repair of vessels by $1,000,000 and to give to the Bureau of Steam Engineering for further construction of machinery in these vessels $1,000,000. That accounts for $6,000,000. The balance of the fund is distributed largely through items a list of which I hold here in my hand, and to which I would be very glad to speak if gentlemen desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the chairman to Senate amendment No. 22, and in doing so to commend the conferees upon the excellent work they have done. If my calculation is correct, you have succeeded in causing a recession upon the part of the Senate in an amount equal to $500,000, which was placed in the bill by the Senate for additional clerical hire more than the amount appropriated for clerical hire in the legislative appropriation bill. I notice you do appropriate $200,000, and authorize $100,000 appropriated by the legislative bill to be used for the purpose of making a statement concerning sailors, seamen, and marines. I call the attention of the House to the fact that in the hearings before the Legislative Committee on the legislative appropriation bill this item was given consideration. The Legislative Committee gave the Navy every penny that they asked for this service, but notwithstanding that fact I understand that they asked for about $700,000 additional. The bill finally gives them $300,000. Is that correct?

Mr. BUTLER. I do wish the House would listen while the gentleman from Indiana is commending the conferees. I do not care to have them listen so particularly when he scolds us. The gentleman is exactly right. An estimate was made for $750,000 to do this work. We objected to appropriating the money. This money is appropriated for the purpose of making up the records of the sailors in the naval service during the war. Those of the marines are already made up. Every State in the Union, so far as I know, asked to have these records made and they should be made. In the judgment of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House $750,000 was entirely too much. There came to us later an offer to make these records for $300,000 and we concluded that we would agree to the Senate amendment, provided $100,000 of the amount was used—as provided for in the legislative appropriation bill—and expended for this purpose. I would say to my friend that we could do no better than that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I commend the members of the conference committee very heartily. With this exception they should be highly commended. This is but another demonstration of what a duplication of appropriations from different committees will do. The Navy Department was given every cent that they asked for for this item.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no question about that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The hearings were full with reference to the amount necessary to complete the records, but notwithstanding that fact they are now seeking to obtain $300,000 more than they said was necessary.

Mr. BUTLER. And aside from the $500,000 saved there, as I calculate, we have saved between four and five hundred thousand dollars asked for clerk hire.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman is entirely too modest in calling the attention of the House to what the conferees have actually accomplished. I desire him to briefly state the amount the conferees have saved from the amount the Senate recommended.

Mr. BUTLER. Between $34,000,000 and $35,000,000 out of the $42,000,000 which the Senate added. I am endeavoring not to excuse but to explain to the House why your conferees permitted an addition of $7,000,000 over what the House appropriated.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will my friend yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I think the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] a question in regard to aviation, which, perhaps, I can answer a little more fully.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Merely for the information of the gentleman, I wish to say that in the House bill we carried for aviation, exclusive, of course, of pay, a trifle under $16,000,000. The conferees have agreed upon $20,000,000. The difference is made up in items of this kind: A proposition, if the conference report is accepted, to erect at San Diego, Calif., a great dirigible station costing $2,775,000; another to erect in Hawaii an aviation base for the Navy, costing about $900,000. The difference of some $450,000 will be expended in the procurement of different types of aircraft, both lighter than air and heavier than air. In view of the importance of aviation and its ultimate growth, I am very glad the increases have been made.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. BURDICK. I call the attention of the gentleman to amendment No. 56, striking out $200,000 for labor, material, and general care of the torpedo station at Newport. I am told that that means that the grounds and buildings will not be kept up during the coming year. Can the gentleman inform me in regard to that?

Mr. BUTLER. That opens a very large question. We discovered that the department has expended for the Navy on the land within the last three years more than $334,000,000. The Naval Affairs Committee of the House has resolved that the end is here. It is true that it is very likely that these buildings will be abandoned.

Mr. BURDICK. At the torpedo station?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The item of $200,000 for the torpedo station, or whatever the item provides for, was eliminated for the reason that the item of $20,000,000 for all stations of similar character will take care of it. Plenty of money has been appropriated to take care of the torpedo station at Newport.

Mr. BURDICK. Then it is not a fact that the grounds and buildings will be allowed to deteriorate?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Oh, no; there is ample money in the sum appropriated covering all of these stations to take care of this particular station and there was no need of particularizing this particular one.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, of course, it is probably true that when the Navy Department begins to smear the butter over the bread there will be a part of the bread that will not have much butter on it. I do not know whether this station will be bread under the butter or not.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. There was no need of carrying this as a separate item.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would suggest that a large appropriation is carried in the bill now for the maintenance of proving grounds, torpedo stations, gun factory, and other stations under the Bureau of Ordnance, which, of course, includes the expenditure necessary for the maintenance of this torpedo station.

Mr. Speaker, with the assistance of the Office of Naval Intelligence, I have made a very careful comparison between the first-line battleships and battle cruisers of Great Britain, and the same character of ships of the American Navy, and I think I can prove without fear of successful contradiction that in first-line 20,000-ton ships of at least 20-knot speed, the United States now has in built and building the most powerful navy in all the world.

It is interesting to note that with the launching of our first 20,000-ton battleship, North Dakota, immediately followed by the Delaware and Utah, in 1909, Great Britain launched her Neptune, of 20,200 tons, so that we each started to build dreadnaughts about 11 years ago.

In subsequent years, when the United States was laying down but one ship or two per annum, Great Britain was launching from five to eight ships whose tonnage varied from 20,600 to 28,500.

During the years 1916, 1917, and 1918, the United States has made tremendous strides in battleship authorizations, with the result that 1923 will see the American Navy the predominant navy of the world and capable of defeating the navies of any three nations combined, excepting, of course, Great Britain.

Beginning with the North Dakota, Delaware, and Utah (leaving out the South Carolina and Michigan because of their light tonnage, although they each carry eight big guns), I find that we have 33 battleships and battle cruisers built and building, all of which will be available for action in 1923, while Great Britain has 35 first-line ships of the same character, thus giving England an advantage of two ships, which we immediately offset by greater speed and tonnage, bigger guns, superior muzzle velocity, heavier armor, and more modern construction.

It will be noted in my figures that the American ships have a total tonnage of 1,118,650 tons as against the British of 884,100 tons, showing a superiority of 234,550 tons, or an advantage of 8,638 tons per ship, equaling 34.2 per cent.

In average speed of all vessels we are practically the same, showing a fraction less than 23.7 knots average per ship.

In main batteries we show 340 guns to 314 for the British, with an average of 10.3 big guns per ship to the British 8.97 guns per ship, while our guns will average 14½-inch caliber as against the British 13⅝-inch, and this would appear to give us a tremendous advantage in weight of cold steel thrown by one broadside when we will hurl 548,400 pounds as against 452,000 pounds by all British big guns. It will be shown that our ships will average 16,618 pounds of projectiles as against 12,914 pounds for a British broadside of main guns, thus proving that our ships will throw 3,704 pounds more steel than the British, ship for ship, or 28.7 per cent superiority.

In the secondary battery our percentage of superiority is even greater than in the main battery, where our 494 guns average 5.4-inch caliber as against the British of 526 guns, with an average of 4.9 inches, showing our guns to average one-half inch larger in caliber and throwing 40,158 pounds of projectiles as against 32,080 for the British secondary battery, which means that our ships will average 1,216½ pounds as against 916½ pounds for the British, or more than 33 per cent superiority in our favor.

It is shown that one volley from all guns on our 33 ships will throw 588,638 pounds of steel as against 484,080 pounds from all British guns, or an excess in our favor of 104,558 pounds, or 4,006 pounds per ship, or a superiority of 29 per cent.

We find ourselves confronted with positive figures showing 34.2 per cent more tonnage, carrying larger guns, throwing 28.7 per cent more long-range steel, more modern ships, with greater radius of action and power than England has ever possessed in first-line fighting ships.

Great Britain has 350 destroyers built and building, while we have 322, but as ours are a little larger than theirs, faster and more modern, it is not unreasonable to assume that our superiority in destroyers is even greater than in first-line battleships and cruisers.

In submarines it will be observed that England has 150 built and building, while we also have 150 built and building, and I am willing to take my chances with American mechanical ingenuity on our underwater ships performing at least as good, if not better, than the British subs.

It is argued by friends of Great Britain that she simply will not allow us to supersede her on the high seas, and to these I can only reply that England is now completing but one battle cruiser of the Hood type of 41,200 tons displacement with a 31-knot speed, carrying eight 15-inch guns, which is in no direction the equal of our Indiana type of superdreadnaught of 43,200 tons and 23-knot speed, carrying twelve 16-inch guns, and that during the past 12 months Great Britain has destroyed the form works and keel of at least one sister ship of the Hood type in the interest of economy, and I maintain that until she can pay interest on her bonded indebtedness, at least to her foreign creditors, she would not be justified in going ahead with a costly competitive battleship program, and particularly so not with us, when she realizes fully that we have no designs upon anything she may have.

While the pride of England may be hurt by her slide into second place among the naval powers of the world, she certainly can not hope to successfully compete against us if we are really determined to take the place we are entitled to on the seas as the world's foremost Nation and where American commerce can receive the protection it failed to get prior to our entrance into the World War.

The phrase "the freedom of the seas" will mean just exactly what it says, and our supremacy thereon will never justify the control and regulation of the commerce of all nations merely because we have the power to do so, as England has done in the past, much to our disappointment and, at times, humiliation.

Mr. Speaker, I will here insert in the RECORD a couple of sheets prepared by the Office of Naval Intelligence of the Navy Department, which will give a detailed description in fighting value, at least, of the first-line ships of Great Britain and the United States:

Comparison of United States and British Navies, capital ships launched 1908 to 1920, inclusive, and ships building or authorized, 1920.

Mr. Speaker, I am sincerely sorry and disappointed that the Senate and House conferees could not have agreed on the establishment of certain necessary naval establishments on the Pacific coast, where we have heretofore never had even so much as a single battleship based and where from now on we will probably always maintain the greater portion of the American Navy.

If the naval establishments on the Pacific coast prior to the last year were but adequate for a few obsolete cruisers and gunboats, they certainly are now thoroughly inadequate to supply the wants of that portion of the American Navy which must in the future base on the Pacific coast for the protection of American commerce and diplomacy, and it is quite hard to explain just why a great naval base in San Francisco Bay is not now in course of construction.

Mr. Speaker, some years ago the Helm Commission was appointed by act of Congress to make a thorough study of conditions on the Pacific coast and to report its findings to Congress.

Among other things, the commission said that in order to be as effectively operated in the Pacific as in the Atlantic the size of the fleet now existing and authorized makes desirable immediate provision for a marked extension in berthing, docking, and repair facilities on the Pacific coast.

For strategic reasons it was found necessary and desirable that there should be at least two navy yards of the first class on the Pacific coast of the United States; that the strategic location, physical characteristics, industrial advantages, and defensibility of the navy yard at Puget Sound are of such character as to make its development as one of these yards not only necessary and desirable but imperative, in view of the requirements of that region for national defense; that the extension of the present navy yard at Mare Island adjacent to San Francisco Bay to meet the requirements of one of two main navy yards on the Pacific coast is impracticable, due to physical limitations, but that its development within certain restrictions is desirable, practicable, and recommended.

In view of the limitations of the Mare Island yard, an additional navy yard capable of accommodating the largest vessels of the fleet is suggested, and that strategic advantages, physical characteristics, industrial development, and defensibility of the San Francisco Bay region makes that location the most desirable for the establishment of another navy yard of the first class on the Pacific coast.

It has been suggested that the capacity of the Pacific coast yards for the maintenance and repair of the fleet should be at least treble that now provided and that development of navy yard facilities to the above requirements should be undertaken without delay and should subsequently keep pace with the development of the Pacific fleet.

Mr. Speaker, the principal objection to the immediate development of a great naval base in San Francisco Bay seems to be the fact that the Government has already expended some $29,000,000 in land and permanent improvements at Mare Island, and it is feared that this vast expenditure will be nullified by the establishment of another base.

Of course, I do not concur in these views and am sure that experts in the Navy Department all agree that the Mare Island yard will always be a first-class repair and construction yard, and the money heretofore expended there will certainly not have been wasted.

Friends of the Mare Island yard have said that if a great base is established on the Pacific that this yard should be the favored one, not because of its desirable location but because of the fact that the Government has already spent so much money upon it.

From my point of view—and I have visited there several times—I feel that it can never be developed into a first-class base because of its physical limitations and its location at the end of a long, narrow channel, which can only be maintained at great expense and with considerable uncertainty.

I question whether a channel of greater depth than 30 feet could be maintained, to say nothing of the other physical limitations at Mare Island which seriously affect its development as a navy yard of the first order. Among these may be mention narrowness and limited area of water adjacent to the navy yard and swift current in Mare Island Strait; wholly inadequate berthing space and no possibility of obtaining such berthing space within reasonable range of repair shops in amounts sufficient for the accommodation of a large number of vessels of the fleet necessarily based thereon if there were no other navy yard in the vicinity; difficulties of navigation to and from the yard during foggy weather, especially for large vessels; the effect of silt in the water in clogging condensers and flushing systems of larger vessels where the injections are low down; insufficiency and undesirability of anchorage ground, even beyond Mare Island Strait; the question of getting a damaged heavy-draft vessel to the yard at any time.

Mr. Speaker, the Helm Commission considered everything in connection with the Mare Island yard and was of the opinion that economical and physical limitations prevent the development of that yard to any extent beyond that necessary for building operations and the maintenance and repair of vessels for the fleet, which could be based and maintained there under conditions of a 30-foot channel approach and of the practical development of berthing space, and because of these circumstances Mare Island could not be considered for development as a naval base suitable for the largest vessels in the Navy.

Mare Island has many advantages due to the defensible location, climate, labor supply, existing dry docks and shops, plant equipment, and various navy-yard accessories of great value and possible service to the fleet; and for these reasons its retention and use for shipbuilding and the repair and maintenance of the fleet within the limitations imposed by the 30-foot channel approaches will always be a desirable yard.

San Francisco Bay must and will be the home of the Pacific fleet, and there will sooner or later be established in that bay one of the greatest naval bases of the world, and the quicker the better.

Mr. Speaker, some three years after the Helm Commission reported on Pacific coast projects the Secretary of the Navy appointed a board known as the "McKean Board," which made a special study of Pacific coast naval projects, and it was in full agreement with the Helm Commission as to the necessity of establishing a first-class naval base on deep water in San Francisco Bay and recommended that the necessary appropriations be obtained from the last Congress to undertake or to begin that project, but up to the present time nothing substantial has come of that recommendation.

With the appointment of the commission provided for in the conference report now pending in the House, final borings will be made at the Alameda and Hunters Point sites before the present Congress ceases to exist, and I hope that we may then pass a suitable appropriation looking toward immediate construction of a naval base of the first class, which is so urgently necessary on the Pacific coast at this time.

Mr. BURDICK. That is what I understood.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no necessity——

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman understands that I am talking about the torpedo station, not the training station, and that the torpedo station is a very important station?

Mr. BRITTEN. We understand that thoroughly, and there is plenty of money under "Ordnance" to care for maintenance and provide for all of the factories and stations we have.

Mr. BURDICK. I so understood, but the folks at home do not.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I propose to yield now to my colleague [Mr. PADGETT], but the gentleman will understand that it is not the purpose of Congress, so far as we understand it, to provide for the repair and preservation of buildings and shops erected purely for war purposes. We can not afford it, but this permanent establishment at Newport will be provided for out of the general fund.

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island. Is there any assurance that any portion of this money out of the general fund will be so used?

Mr. BUTLER. We have the assurances given us by the Chief of Bureau of Ordnance, and I have no doubt it will be provided for in some way. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. He says that length of time will be sufficient.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss at length the conference report. The Senate amendments, in round numbers, amounted to about $41,000,000 or a little more, and the conferees of the House have agreed to a little more than $7,000,000. I want to say that in my judgment if the conferees have made any mistake it has been in too big a cut upon some of the Senate amendments. It is in the line of economy and reduction by cutting too closely, if we have made any mistake at all. I do not think that we can be charged with any element of extravagance in what we have done.

Mr. Speaker, I state it as a fundamental proposition that the administration is entitled to credit for what is accomplished during its term and likewise is responsible for what it fails to accomplish. In other words, the administration is to be judged by results and be known by the fruits of its labors. If success crowns its efforts, it should have commendation; if failure is the result of its efforts or inaction, it should be held responsible. By these principles let the Democratic administration be tested.

In view of the fact that the Sixty-sixth Congress met in extra session May 19, 1919, and has been almost continuously in session since, and the Republicans in control of the Congress have devoted their time and energy to criticizing the Democratic administration and have appointed numerous investigating committees for the purpose of and in an effort to discredit the Democratic administration, I deem it appropriate to compare the achievements and accomplishments of the Democratic administration in the management and upbuilding of the Navy during the seven years of President Wilson's administration, since March 4, 1913, with the Republican administrations from March 4, 1897, to March 3, 1913, under Presidents McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft. This comparison will clearly show that the Democratic Party has been the real friend and true builder of the American Navy. History also shows that the Democratic Party in the past has been the real friend and builder of the American Navy.

For weeks past there has been exhibited in the lobby of the House prominent placards, placed there by Republicans, showing a comparison between the Navy of the United States and the Navy of Great Britain and setting forth comparative figures showing the superiority of the Navy of the United States. This statement placed on public exhibition in the lobby of the House by Republicans is so illustrating and such a positive commendation and proof of the splendid and successful administration of the Navy by the Democratic administration under President Wilson and Secretary Daniels that I wish to set it forth herein.

This statement makes a comparison of the condition of the American Navy and the British Navy in the year 1923, by which time it is expected that the 1916 building program authorized by a Democratic Congress, upon the recommendation of President Wilson, will be completed. The American Navy total broadside fire 588,638 pounds, as compared with the British broadside fire of 484,080 pounds. Actual superiority in total weight of broadside projectiles: United States Navy 22 per cent, and in weight of broadside projectiles per ship 29 per cent. First-line battleship comparison, 1923, shows United States superiority in total displacement 26.5 per cent; superiority in displacement of average ship 34.2 per cent. United States Navy total displacement 1,118,650 tons; average per ship, 33,898 tons; average speed, 23.64 knots. British Navy: Total displacement 884,100 tons; average per ship, 25,260 tons; average speed, 23.68 knots:

United States Navy:
Main battery guns, total	340
Average caliber, inches	14½
Average number of guns per ship	10.3
British Navy:
Main battery guns, total	314
Average caliber, inches	13⅝
Average number of guns per ship	8.97

As I have stated, these placards were placed on public exhibition in the lobby of the House by Republicans, and they bear testimony of the remarkable and successful administration of the Navy by the present Democratic administration.

Mr. Meyer, when Secretary of the Navy under President Taft, in his annual report says:

> Germany is now second among the principal naval powers in warship tonnage built and building, and the United States is third.

I could cite other official statements showing that the Navy of the United States was No. 3 when the Democratic Party came into power in 1913, and now Republicans are proudly advertising and boasting that it is superior to the British Navy, and citing in support thereof the comparisons above given. It should also be remembered that in 1909 the Navy of the United States held second place but under the Republican administration it soon fell to the third place.

I feel justified in calling attention to this matter and emphasizing it because it has been the policy, practice, and delight of the Republicans in Congress to criticize and find fault with and seek to disparage the Democratic administration in every conceivable manner, and yet they have unwittingly borne testimony to the splendid administration and successful upbuilding of the Navy by placing and keeping these placards for weeks on public exhibition in the lobby of the House. It should be remembered that it was the Democratic administration in 1916, for the first time in the history of this country, passed the great constructive legislation authorizing the three-year building program, comprising a total of 157 ships, the result of which was to bring the Navy of the United States from its position of third to its present position of superiority in fighting efficiency and military value as shown by the placards posted by Republicans in the lobby of the House.

It should also be borne in mind and emphasized that the Republicans since they gained control of the Senate and the House in March, 1919, have not added one single ship or authorized the addition of one single ship to the Navy of the United States. Its present preeminent position is due to the present Democratic administration.

It was also the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress which in 1915 created the office of Naval Operations in the Navy Department, thereby creating for the first time in the history of the Navy a systematic and coherent organization of the Navy for the successful and scientific operation of ships. It was because of this legislation, as well as the other personnel legislation, embraced in the act of August 29, 1916, that the Navy was such a capable, efficient, and coordinated organization when we entered the war in April, 1917. All that was necessary for the Navy to do was to add men and material in order to expand and meet all the demands and emergencies of the war. It was also the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress which in 1916, for the first time in the history of the Navy, gave proper and necessary rank and title to the officers of the several staff corps of the Navy and created and established in time of peace the rank and title of admiral and vice admiral for the commanders of our naval fleets, thereby relieving the Navy of the United States from the embarrassment and humiliation under which it had been suffering for years.

I should also call attention to the fact that, under the legislation of the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress, when we entered the war the Navy was splendidly equipped and prepared with powder, projectiles, mines, and other equipment necessary for the successful operation of the ships of the various fleets.

The manufacture of 100,000 mines and the laying of a mine barrage from the north end of Scotland to the southern boundaries of Norway—about 230 miles across the North Sea—thereby bottling up the German submarines and preventing their entrance into the Atlantic Ocean, was a marvelous and most wonderful feat of naval strategy and naval accomplishment and reflects credit upon the American Navy and the Democratic administration in charge of the Navy.

The convoying of almost 2,000,000 soldiers 3,000 miles overseas without the loss of a soldier under American convoy challenges the admiration of the world and entitles the American Navy to the love and affection of all those who esteem courage and cherish patriotic duty, and commands the plaudits not alone of the people of the United States but of the world. This is another splendid achievement of the Democratic administration.

It was a Democratic Congress, upon the recommendation of a Democratic administration, that in 1916, by legislation, authorized and provided for a Naval Reserve personnel for the first time in the history of the Government, and under the operation of this Democratic legislation, when the war came on, the Navy was enabled to enroll in the Naval Reserve and use in the active operation of the war something like 500,000 Naval Reserves. These Naval Reserves did splendid service during the war, and this legislation, provided for by a Democratic Congress and a Democratic administration prior to our entrance into the war, enabled the Navy to expand in an orderly and organized way and utilize this vast Naval Reserve Force in the naval operations of the war. Had it not been for this Democratic legislation authorizing and establishing the Naval Reserves the Navy would have been at a great disadvantage and badly crippled in its effort to meet the requirements of the war. This is another evidence of wise legislation of the Democratic administration and the Democratic Congress.

I might cite many other instances of wise legislation and of the splendid ministrations of the Democratic administration and of the Democratic Congress to show the foresight in having the Navy prepared for times of emergency, and how splendidly it was operated during the war, and how justly and well it earned and received the plaudits and affection of the American people, but I deem it useless to do so. The splendid conduct and great work and achievements of the Navy are known and recognized by all the world. It was the Democratic administration and Democratic Congress which made it so and it is entitled to and should receive the approbation of all the people who believe credit should be given when and where due.

I feel justified in calling attention to the fact that not only during the Democratic administration since 1913, but all through the history of our country, the Democratic Party has been the real friend and builder of the American Navy. After the War of the Revolution the American Navy was allowed to disintegrate and largely go to pieces, and it was Thomas Jefferson who, in 1786, urged the establishment of a naval service for this country in order that there might be put an end to the depredations that were being committed upon our commerce by Barbary pirates. At that time it was being urged that there was no money in the Treasury to be used for the purpose of a naval force, to which Jefferson replied:

> There never will be money in the Treasury until the Confederacy shows its teeth, and a naval force can never endanger our liberties nor occasion bloodshed.

It was during the administration of President James K. Polk and Mr. Bancroft, then Secretary of the Navy, both Democrats, that the Naval Academy at Annapolis was established, thereby providing the means for the education and training of the commissioned personnel of the Navy, which time has shown to be the most efficient and best equipped naval commissioned personnel in all the world. Later again the Navy had been neglected, and Franklin Pierce, another Democratic President, took active steps to have it rehabilitated and remove from it the stigma of being the "Rip Van Winkle of our national defense." At the close of the Civil War the United States possessed a creditable and capable Navy judged by the standards of that period. The Republican Party remained in power and control of the Government from 1860 through 1884, and we find the good Navy that we had at the close of the Civil War was neglected, disintegrated, and became in such a condition that no one would do it reverence. President Cleveland, a Democratic President, came into control in March, 1885, and under Mr. Whitney, a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, new life and vigor were imparted to the Navy and the foundation was laid for the creation of a modern, up-to-date Navy. The Republicans again came into control in March, 1887, and we find that the Navy was again neglected and began to retrograde and to lower its standards and efficiency until the second administration of President Cleveland, in 1892, when, under the administration of Hilary A. Herbert, a Democratic Secretary of the Navy, new life and vigor were imparted into the Navy and its restoration to its proper place was again undertaken. In 1897 the Republicans again came into power and control of the Government, and the Republican administration continued until March, 1913. During these 16 years the American Navy lagged behind and the German Navy progressed, developed, and passed the American Navy, until we find at the close of the administration of President Taft the Navy of the United States occupied the third position among the navies of the world. President Wilson and a Democratic Congress began to give considerate attention to the rehabilitation and upbuilding of the Navy. The President, in his recommendations to Congress and in his addresses to the public, recommended and advocated the importance and necessity of rehabilitating the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy cordially seconded and cooperated with the recommendations of the President, and the Democratic Congress enacted legislation, so that during the seven years of Democratic administration the Navy has risen from third place to have, receive, and enjoy the distinction of having Republicans publicly placard in large letters in the lobby of the House of Representatives in parallel positions the statements quoted above, showing that in ships, tonnage, speed, gunpower, and projectiles the superiority of the American Navy over that of the British Navy, which has always heretofore been recognized as the ruler of the seas, the splendid and well-deserved testimonial from Republicans of the great success and wonderful achievements of the Democratic administration in the management and upbuilding of the Navy of the United States. These placards silence criticism and proclaim the splendid success of the Democratic administration.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request, to extend my remarks on the Navy.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the conferees on the part of the House for the very great reductions which were made in the Senate amendments. The bill as now agreed to is some $34,000,000 less in amount than as passed by the Senate. I believe that the service would not have suffered had there been still further reductions. I think the bill is overliberal, but with the present extravagant management of the Navy Department, with the constant pressure of the administration for increases, this bill is as low as we could hope to have it, and I congratulate the House, the members of the House committee, and the conferees on the part of the House on the successful efforts they have made to cut this bill as low as it is. The bill as it now goes to the President carries $433,279,574; this is $139,851,680.80 less than the estimates. In other words, the Congress has saved this sum in appropriating for the Navy, and yet the sum appropriated is overgenerous. What a commentary this is on the reckless and extravagant estimates of the departments!

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report, and move the previous question on that motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the motion by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks on the subject of general legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on general legislation. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. And, Mr. Speaker, if I refer to the bonus legislation at all it will be simply a reference to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if he is to show us exactly how much we will save?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall try to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman gotten us out of debt yet?

Mr. MONDELL. Not quite.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming calls up a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 5th day of June, 1920, at 4 o'clock.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Speaker, I think in the consideration of this important resolution there ought to be more Members here than there are, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. There is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Edmonds	Jefferis	Rhodes	Young, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. On this call 303 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to amend the resolution which I presented by adding at the end of it the letters "p. m."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks leave to add the letters "p. m." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think amendment is necessary, but some gentlemen thought it was, and so we will make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. Speaker, Congress has been in session almost continuously for more than a year. During that time it has considered a very great volume of highly important business. We have passed or will have passed before we adjourn all of the regular appropriation bills of this session and eight of the regular appropriation bills that should have been passed by the former session. We have had some of the most important questions and problems before us that any legislative body has ever considered. All the more important legislation has been disposed of. We have not and we will not by Saturday night have considered and settled all of the questions that have been brought to the attention of the Congress, possibly not all of the questions that ought to be passed upon one way or another; but we shall have disposed of, so far at least as the House is concerned, practically every important matter before us for consideration.

Congress is a very important body in America, and yet there are times when the country is just as well off and just as happy with the Congress in adjournment. [Applause.] We might remain in session all summer, and possibly if we did we might settle some questions not wholly, fully, and completely settled now. But, after all, I know of none and I think of none that we can settle that is so important that it can not wait until December. The Members of the Congress have earned a vacation—have abundantly earned it. [Applause.] In my opinion the country will justify and approve our standing in adjournment when the regular appropriation bills are passed and the other measures now immediately before us are disposed of.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

I realize that in a matter of this kind there is always an opportunity, or at least a temptation, to play politics. I know personally that practically every man in the House—well, there are some exceptions, but they are negligible in number—practically every man in the House desires and hopes for an adjournment. [Applause.] I want to express the hope that gentlemen feeling that way will not make the effort to secure a little possible political advantage at home by voting against this adjournment resolution and praying at the same time that it will pass. [Applause.] If we vote our convictions on this resolution, convictions as I know them, for I have taken the trouble to talk with Members on both sides about this matter, we will vote for the adjournment.

I have not brought this resolution in hurriedly, without consideration, without consultation with gentlemen on both sides of the aisle; I have brought it in only after I was satisfied that the overwhelming majority of the Members of this House desire an adjournment, and I have only brought it in in this form because I believed that it embodied and proposed the action which gentlemen desire. I have presented it here for the purpose of meeting the view, accomplishing the hope and the expectation, of gentlemen on both sides. Therefore I trust there will be few, if any, votes against it.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, the country realizes that whether or not this Congress has lived up to the best expectations of the American people, whether or not it has accomplished all that might have been accomplished, it has been earnest, it has been industrious, and it has been devoted to the public service. It has, or will have by the time the hour of adjournment comes, provided fully for the public service in the matter of appropriations and in the matter of legislation.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. And in that state of affairs I think the people will indorse the good judgment of the Congress in adjourning.

Mr. BLANTON. Unfortunately, the Congress has not pleased Mr. Gompers.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I agree with what the gentleman has said as to the desire of this Congress to adjourn. However, there is a matter, I think, if we are to adjourn, should receive attention before we do so. A great many of the Congressmen here, no doubt a majority of them, know something about the very serious condition that is prevailing throughout the country with reference to coal. Many manufacturing institutions in Indiana are now shutting down; some of the very largest will have to shut down in a very few days. They can not get coal because of the fact that they say when they go to the mines to get it they can not get it because the mines are filling export contracts.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the gentleman thinks we ought to have a coal embargo—an embargo on exports?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If it is necessary in order to take care of our coal, I will say, yes.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a very large question, a question that has very many sides to it, and on which there would be a very great diversity of opinion.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, we shall not have settled all of the questions and all of the problems that all of the people of the country have in their thoughts and on their minds, and we never will, and no Congress ever will, no matter when the hour of adjournment shall come. The work of a Congress, like the work of a housewife, is never done, and the time will never come when it can be said that every question and every problem that anyone may think should be disposed of has been disposed of when a Congress adjourned. If we were here a month or two or three months, for every matter settled two would arise.

Mr. OLIVER. The small city and country newspapers are vitally interested in certain legislation now pending before a Senate committee in reference to print paper. Is the gentleman informed as to whether any legislation on that subject will be considered before adjournment?

Mr. MONDELL. I think it is rather doubtful, because I do not think that the majority of the Congress now has in mind very clearly any legislation that Congress should enact that would cure the situation, but if there is anything we can do we should and before we adjourn.

Mr. OLIVER. My information is that definite recommendations have been made to the Senate committee on the subject, and it is thought that if legislation following such recommendations is now enacted it will be of material help to a most distressing situation.

Mr. BRIGGS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is contemplated to take any definite action in the way of passing legislation in connection with the recommendations of the joint commission on postal salaries at this session?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not say definitely but I hope so.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say in reply to the question of the gentleman, if the gentleman will permit, that the joint commission has made its report, that the report is unanimous, and it was accompanied by a bill, which bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads last night; that bill has been reported to the House to-day, and it is contemplated that we shall ask for its consideration on Thursday morning. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a very pressing and important matter in which the farmers of the country are interested, and for lack of which they are suffering; that is, nitrates. I wanted to know if there is any purpose to relieve that situation by legislation? There are bills pending, one introduced by the gentleman for California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. MONDELL. I think there is no one who knows better than my friend who just interrupted that there is nothing that this Congress can do at this time that will aid in securing at any time in the near future an additional supply of nitrates for the farmer. There are bills pending which would allow the expenditure of a very great amount of public money in the hope on the part of some gentlemen that out of that very great expenditure, some time in the very distant future, we might have an increased supply of nitrates.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit a further question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. There is legislation pending which, if enacted, would relieve the situation, in my opinion, by operating plants that the Government has already constructed and that are ready for operation.

Mr. MONDELL. We will try to take care of all these matters that can be cared for.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. EAGAN. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], is it the gentleman's opinion that we will have definite legislative action on the report of the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded. Those who desire taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Thirty-six gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed and move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed and to lay that motion on the table. Without objection, the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. I object, Mr. Speaker. I objected to the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to reconsider the vote and to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 125, noes 52.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-five Members are present—a quorum. The ayes have it, and the motion to lay on the table prevails.

CHANGE IN THE RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider House resolution 324, under the general rules of the House.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has this resolution been reported to the House?

Mr. FESS. It has been. Does the gentleman mean from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The other committee.

Mr. FESS. Yes. The rule makes in order for immediate consideration resolution 324, which provides for a change in the rules of the House on matters pertaining to appropriations.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] begins will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GARRETT. It occurs to me that it might be desirable, if the gentleman is agreeable, to see about the arrangement for time. I suspect there are a number of gentlemen who do not know just what this is. This is the budget rule that provides for an appropriation committee of 35 members. I want to say now that I have at this time no request for time on the rule, and I am not opposed to the rule, but some gentlemen have indicated that they desire time on the rule which comes from the Budget Committee; and under the practice of this rule, if it is adopted, there will be just an hour, which, of course, will be held within the control of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]; and it just occurred to me that perhaps we might couple the two propositions together and agree upon time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no limit upon the time.

Mr. GARRETT. So far as the rule is concerned there is not.

Mr. FESS. I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD] would try to get an agreement as to time as soon as we have disposed of the rule.

I yield to my friend from Tennessee for any suggestion he might make.

Mr. GARRETT. Let us for the moment couple the two propositions together and see if the gentleman from Iowa can help us out of the situation. Has the gentleman from Iowa any proposition in mind as to time?

Mr. GOOD. I have conferred with those who are opposed to the proposition and with those who are in favor of the proposition, and I am frank to say to the gentleman that when the rule is adopted I shall ask that my time be extended for one hour, and then I will yield one-half of that time to those who are opposed to the proposition, and if additional time is required the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the ranking member on that side, will be entitled to one hour. The matter is technical, and I understand a motion to recommit has been prepared and that it will be offered as a substitute at the close.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I may, I will call the matter to the attention of the gentleman now. I had not heard of that motion to recommit before, but I doubt if that motion would be in order if anybody would make a point of order. It is not in order to move to recommit a report from the Committee on Rules. It is true that this is not a report from the Committee on Rules, but this is the report of a rule, and I doubt if it would be in order to recommit it.

Mr. GOOD. I wanted to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that it is the character of the committee that reports it which determines. The Budget Committee is a legislative committee, and while it reports out the rule, so far as I am concerned I have no objection to the motion to recommit, and will not raise that question, and I hope no one else will.

Mr. GARRETT. I do not know. I just merely suggested that question. I presume that the arrangement which the gentleman from Iowa has suggested will be carried out, and that he will request an hour additional; that is to say, two hours in all.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. And will divide that time equally between those for and those against. I presume that will be adhered to by the House when the time comes to make the request; and with that statement I have no requests for time on the rule.

Mr. GOOD. I want to suggest that the time which I yield will be only for debate and not for the offering of amendments, and it is to be equally divided.

Mr. GARRETT. As I understand, it is the purpose of the gentleman himself to offer one amendment.

Mr. GOOD. I am going to offer one amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and another amendment to correct a typographical error only.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose to confine the debate exclusively to the subject matter of the budget proposition?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is it the understanding that H. Res. 324 is to be read by sections, that each section is subject to amendment to be read under the five-minute rule?

Mr. FESS. It is to be considered as a House bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will not be read for amendment—not read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAUGEN. And what is the arrangement as to the general debate?

Mr. FESS. That will be reached after the adoption of the rule. The understanding is that we are to have two hours, to be equally divided between those for and those against the resolution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the new rule would eliminate the numerous appropriating committees as appropriating committees, leaving them simply as legislative committees, and confining the appropriations to one committee, which, I think, it is quite apparent was the original idea when the Committee on Appropriations was first established, in order to centralize all the appropriations under one committee and thus avoid duplication and waste of public funds. But since that date the appropriating function has been so extended that as you now recognize, instead of one Committee on Appropriations, as originally planned, we have at least eight appropriation committees. The purpose of this resolution is to confine the appropriations to one committee, to be created under the authority of this resolution now before us, which the rule makes in order for immediate consideration. The committee is to be composed of 35 members, so that evidently it will permit subcommittees representing all of the committees which now are appropriation committees.

I have noted that there has been a good deal of opposition to that suggestion from individual Members, but I feel that the opposition is not tenable, for the reason that we are trying to get away from the one position of making the committee which reports a bill purely a committee of advocacy, giving it a trading position, which has come to be known as pork-barrel legislation. We are trying to get away from the practice of providing for a particular activity of the Government with no relation at all to the other activities of the Government. Under the present system we find not only duplication but that the committee reporting one of these bills is anxious not to hold down the estimates, but rather to get a larger appropriation to meet the alleged needs of that particular branch of the service as estimated by the spokesman of the service. Another committee is equally anxious, indeed it may be said that every committee is ambitious for funds, and we see eight committees working, not together, but each working for itself with no relationship whatever to one another, and with small regard to the sum total of all the committees. This proposed rule is intended to cure that, to make all of the appropriating agencies in one committee, so that every part of that committee will be making its appropriations with reference, not only to each part, but especially to what the whole committee will ultimately make. The committees of the present Congress have made a splendid record in economies, but it is largely due to the general demand. As soon as this demand passes we will be back to the old order.

It seems to me that among all the constructive and reconstructive measures of this Congress or any other Congress that has sat in the past years, here is a proposal that is going to meet not only with the approval of the business of the country, but also with the approval of the people at large.

I think the passage of the budget bill almost unanimously showed the universal demand for it. That bill is now before the President, and is likely to be signed very shortly. This resolution is the last step to make the budget system a reality. It is supplemental to the budget bill, and is necessary to make it workable. I want to say to my friends who have spoken to me in antagonism to it that I think that to refuse this proposed change of rule would be to adopt a plan and then emasculate it by denying the power of making the plan workable. To me it would be totally inconsistent to go to the extent to which we have already gone, to adopt the budget system in response to an almost universal demand of the country and then refuse to do the one thing necessary to make the system operative. The refusal to make it workable leads to the conviction that those who refrain from openly opposing the system so universally demanded have seized upon this plan to conceal their opposition most effectively.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman has stated his view as to how this committee of 35 would be made up. Is that just the gentleman's notion? There is certainly nothing in the resolution to provide how this enlarged Committee on Appropriations shall be made up.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Ohio has expressed only his individual opinion. I should think that would be a very reasonable statement to make.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman refer to the reasonableness of my statement? It was not a statement, but a question.

Mr. FESS. I refer to both of them—the reasonableness of my statement and the reasonableness of the gentleman's inquiry. Both are rational.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman knows that this committee of 35 can be made up just as the House shall direct how it shall be made up, and perhaps the gentlemen connected with other committees will not be consulted when this committee is made up. The gentleman gives me only his personal opinion as to the composition of this committee.

Mr. FESS. I have no right whatever to say how a committee of this sort will be made up, first because I have no information on the matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it not have been well to have obtained some information?

Mr. FESS. But it strikes me that in making up the committee certainly the men who from long service on the committees have been informed on the various activities of the Government would be recognized in the appointments which are to be made.

Mr. BUTLER. Would there have been anything really objectionable in having the gentleman's views incorporated into this resolution, so that the resolution itself should state how the committee should be composed? That would have given us some information to go upon.

Mr. FESS. Speaking for myself, I do not think that would be at all essential.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman says that in carrying out the budget plan this is the one thing that remains to be done. Is this the only plan that the committee recommending the proposition has considered and is able to tell us about, or has it considered other plans, so that perhaps we might be able to choose between different plans?

Mr. FESS. This is the one plan that has come from the Budget Committee to the Committee on Rules, and it seems to me that it is a most rational proposal and sufficiently valuable that no other plan would need to be submitted. at least I have not thought of any other plan, and the committee submitted it, or at least has reported no other plan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Was no other plan discussed by the committee?

Mr. FESS. I am not a member of the Budget Committee and I do not know whether there was or not.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It seems to me that there was room for some difference of opinion as to the proposition, and some members of the committee might have had other views in the way of carrying out the budget proposition beside this.

Mr. FESS. I am not a member of the Budget Committee and therefore could not speak as to whether there was any other suggestion or not. I am satisfied, however, with this proposition as far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman from Ohio will yield, the Budget Committee considered every plan presented to it, and we had a large number of the most distinguished people in the United States before us.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will we be able to hear what other plans were considered, so that we can intelligently decide in regard to it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Undoubtedly the chairman of the committee will answer that question fully.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In the event that this rule is adopted what will be the functions of committees that have heretofore been appropriation committees?

Mr. FESS. They will be legislative committees only, just as the other committees of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. And they will not have the right to recommend appropriations?

Mr. FESS. Yes, they can recommend appropriations but can not make appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Under the Constitution the House organizes itself. You may adopt this rule now, and if it goes into effect the budget system will be carried out so far as the recommendations are concerned. But when a new Congress is elected it makes its own rules and it may adopt this rule or it may adopt another rule.

Mr. FESS. Yes, if they do not want this they can eliminate it and adopt other rules. Rules of the House are limited to the Congress which adopts them.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understood the gentleman to say that these other committees that have heretofore had jurisdiction of appropriations would be permitted to legislate.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does not the gentleman understand that all legislation is dependent on appropriations? As stated by the gentleman from Ohio the other day, the bonus bill carried no appropriation. What becomes of a bonus bill unless you have an appropriation for it? So all along the line. We passed the Army bill the other day with the contention that there were three times as many men provided for as there ought to be, but it was said that it would be regulated by the appropriations. Why not be fair and say that if this rule is adopted it means that 435 Members surrender their power and jurisdiction to 35 Members? Why not be honest with the House and state the facts?

Mr. FESS. I was trying to state the facts. We do not eliminate any committees. Committees are still in existence and have all the power they had before save the one and only power of appropriation that we take away from them and put in one committee.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. JUUL. May I state a concrete case to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. FESS. I will yield.

Mr. JUUL. The Committee on Agriculture came in here with a bill on which the Senate had put 202 amendments, and every one of them was a matter of finance. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that if we pass this bill a committee of 35 will sit to pass final judgment on all those amendments?

Mr. FESS. No; I do not mean anything of the kind. When any committee other than the Appropriation Committee brings in any appropriation it is not authorized to bring in it will be subject to a point of order which anybody can make.

Mr. JUUL. I am favorably disposed to a budget system. But the gentleman knows that the committee just mentioned has spent weeks and months perfecting a bill, and that the committee of conference has sat some weeks, and how can 35 Members split themselves up so as to settle the differences that it has taken all nine committees days and days to settle?

Mr. FESS. It will be a continuous performance. The 35 men will sit in subdivisions, if you put it that way. Each subdivision considering its particular subject must consult with all other interests, and in this way will be better able to subserve the interests of the country at large than could be done with seven or eight committees running at cross purposes, each getting what it can with no regard for the others. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there will be plenty of time for general debate, I will move the previous question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will withhold that, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said that there was no request for time on the rule, but since he left—and he had to go away to attend another meeting of the Committee on Rules—he requested me to say that if there was any request for time on his side to yield it for him.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman want time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] wants five minutes, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] wants five minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 38 minutes.

Mr. FESS. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, would not the minority, under the rule, be entitled to 20 minutes?

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been ordered.

Mr. FESS. We are proceeding under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question had originally been ordered, there would be 20 minutes on a side, but the Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio will yield.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, if it is considered the better plan, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been trying to find out just what this rule provides for. It seems to me that Members of the House ought to have the opportunity to give a matter of this importance very careful and candid consideration. Here is a rule brought in to make in order another proposition to change the rules of the House. The principal point of the proposed change in the rules of the House, as I understand it, is to put into the hands of 35 Members of this House the right to report any and all appropriation bills. It takes away from the Committee on Agriculture, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, from the Committee on Military Affairs, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and from every other committee that now has the authority of appropriation the right to do so, and vests that power in one committee composed of 35 Members. I believe the place to defeat this resolution changing these rules is to vote down the rule that makes it in order to consider it, and that is the reason I am discussing the matter now. I am going to oppose the change in the rules. I am opposed to this one big committee that takes charge of all of the appropriations, and I believe the time to beat that proposition is to beat it right now, when we vote on this resolution that comes from the Committee on Rules.

I happen to have been a member of the Committee on Agriculture every year since I have been here, and I will have been here 10 years when I finish this term. I say to you that with 10 years of service on that committee I am in a better position to say what shall be appropriated for the various things that relate to agriculture than any two or three members on a subcommittee from an appropriation committee of 35 members. I say to you that there are gentlemen here who have been on the Military Affairs Committee for years and years, gentlemen who have been on the Naval Affairs Committee for years and years, and they are acquainted with all of the intricacies that relate to the affairs of their committees and are in better position to say how much shall be appropriated and how it shall be apportioned in the Committee on Military Affairs and in the Committee on Naval Affairs, and so on, than a subcommittee of a committee of 35 members composing this proposed new appropriation committee. I believe you are going to make a mistake if you adopt this rule and if you go ahead and adopt the change in the rules of the House, and I hope that the resolution from the Committee on Rules will not be agreed to. Let us make the test vote on the adoption of the rule.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for some years, and I never yet have made a point of no quorum, but I think a quorum ought to be present to listen to these remarks.

Mr. RUBEY. I think the gentleman should not make that point now.

Mr. ALMON. Very well. I withdraw the point for the present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter and will affect every Member of the House. It is going to affect the future policy of the House. I take it that every Member has at heart the welfare of the country and is in favor of economical appropriations, but I want to say this: It took 40 years' fight in the House of Representatives to obtain the present system of appropriating committees. It was under Hon. John H. Reagan, of Texas, who became chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, that we broke away from the power and tyranny of the great appropriations committee. As everyone familiar with the history of the procedure of the House of Representatives knows, the Ways and Means Committee for a long time raised the taxes and made the appropriations until 1865, when Thaddeus Stevens was appointed chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and Justin Morrill was left as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. It was until 1885 before the jurisdiction of the Committee on Appropriations was taken away and distributed to the various committees of the House. It was done with the Rivers and Harbors Committee, and I refer you to the language in the RECORD of the great Speaker Reed, who was quoted in this report as being in favor of an appropriation committee having all of the jurisdiction. I refer you to his speech at the time they broke away in 1885 from the power of this great committee.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Speaker Reed did say that, but Speaker Reed also said that he made the greatest legislative mistake in his career when he did so.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I concede that the gentleman from Illinois is correct in his statement as to what Speaker Reed said, and I want to say to you that when you put all the power of appropriating money in the hands of one committee of this House, the rest of you may just as well pack up your trunks and go back home and stay there, for they will not have any use for you then.

What brought about the reform? It was the absolute power that was exercised by this Appropriations Committee. I have no fault to find with the personnel of the Committee on Appropriations of this House. They are fine men, they are high-class citizens, and they are alert to their duties as Members. Here is what we ought to have: You ought to have an excise committee in this House, composed of a man from every State in the Union, consisting of 48 members, who will sit and determine what the total amount is that shall be appropriated for the different purposes, and permit the various appropriating committees to make their own selections as to how the amount shall be appropriated in conformity with the budget system that you are going to put into effect. If you do as is proposed here, you will turn back the House 40 years and fix upon us a system that you will regret to the longest day you spend here.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Oklahoma knows as well as any man in the House, because he is one of the distinguished Members of the House, that there must be a stop to this indiscriminate spending of the public money, and it will never stop as long as this committee and that committee and the other committee has appropriating power, because they all come to believe that they are compelled to introduce a bill and pass it appropriating large sums of money.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman knows that the whole matter is referred to the Congress, and oftentimes when an appropriating committee comes in with a bill the House raises the appropriations or lowers them over the protests of the appropriating committee and its chairman. The matter is all left to the House. We talk a lot about economy, but many do not practice what they preach.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. May I have two minutes more, in order to finish?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am in favor of economy. I have undertaken to vote on every occasion in favor of economy, but what I want to say to you is this: You should not take away from these committees their power to assemble and make appropriations for the different purposes for which the amount is to be appropriated. If you want to regulate the amount, have your excise committee fix the total which can be appropriated by any committee, and let that committee then appropriate as their needs from the hearings show they are entitled to be appropriated. I want to say to you I am not on any of these committees which appropriate money, and I have no selfish interest in making this fight, but I simply want to call attention to what is going to happen, that when you put the power of appropriating money in this one committee, the personnel of the committee will change as times go on, and they will become the sole power in this House, and the other committees will be mere nonentities without power to do anything, and this House will have one committee, which will be the Appropriations Committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time at my disposal to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to take my chances with one appropriating committee that is to have all possible authority in the House. I am not afraid, like my colleague from Oklahoma, that they will treat the other Members of Congress with indifference. If they do not treat us right, we can devil the very life out of them, and my friend ought to know that. But the time has come when this Congress has got to stop spending the people's money indiscriminately. That time will never come until the appropriating power is put in the hands of an appropriating committee. Where every committee here and there indiscriminately has power of appropriation extravagance will never stop. This Nation, as has been said so many times by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], has not any money of its own. Every dollar that it has it gets out of the pockets of the people through taxation. We hear so much about reducing taxes. Taxes will never be reduced until we quit spending so much money, because when we spend less money we have to take less money from the people. That is the way to reduce taxes, to quit spending, and we are not going to quit spending until we have some new system of economy in Congress, and I am glad to see this proposition come before the House. It is not any big bugaboo anyhow, and I hope both the rule and the resolution will pass. It will save at least $100,000,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, what I have to say here is impersonal. It matters not to me what you may do. I do not expect to take part in making appropriations very much longer for the support of the Naval Establishment, and therefore what I say has nothing in it that is personal or selfish. Permit me to say I have done the best I could do to be economical. Within the last half hour gentlemen of the House have commended the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House for its economy. Now you propose to take from this committee authority which you have said your servants have well exercised. I want, however, to join, if it can be possible to them, enough gentlemen having a similar view; that we should have further assistance in the way of reducing appropriations—that is, keeping them down to the minimum and as much restraint as may be necessary—I will join with you in obtaining, but to take from these committees the work of distributing and allotting these sums after the sums have been fixed, I think, is unfair to them and the great work they have been doing. I believe you will dwarf the membership of the House if you do it and destroy the usefulness of Members of the House. This committee of 35 men to be selected from the body of the House should have authority given it, in my judgment, to fix what the appropriations should be for the different bureaus and departments of the Government. Having once fixed the amount, even if it goes down to the appropriations for the different bureaus, that fixed sum should be handed over to these technical committees for the purpose of allotment, if I use the proper expression, for its distribution. Having once made the distribution the result should be reported back to this committee for its approval. That far I will go and I will be very glad if such a provision as that could be made.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. How long does it take the Committee on Naval Affairs to hear the testimony regarding the appropriations for the naval appropriation bills? Weeks, does it not?

Mr. BUTLER. It takes from 10 to 12 weeks.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think that if one committee has charge of all these appropriations proper care and attention would be paid to the details?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I am not holding out as an example anything I have done in 24 years upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, for I do not. Other men must succeed us. We are growing old. I have known men who sat at the foot of the table finally come to the head on several occasions. I only ask that the right may be given to these men to make the distribution of the fund after another body has determined what the amount should be. I will go that far, but I do not think, as I said a while ago, it is worth while for me to make any suggestions.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. You have to beg for time in order to express yourself in this House, and the time has certainly come when the membership of the House will assert itself.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Can a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations handle naval affairs as well or better than 21 men who give all their time to it?

Mr. BUTLER. I should think not. I have had many years of experience, and I know the time and patience required of men to sit and act intelligently on this committee.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAGEE].

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I am most heartily in favor of House resolution 324. The very essence of a budgetary system is concentration of appropriations in one committee. Having voted for the budget bill, we are in honor bound to adopt this resolution. In no other way can we consummate an effective national budget system.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, I am not exercised over the question of who shall wield the power in this House. It is not a question of who shall do the business of this House. The sole question is how the business of the House can best be done, and to that I intend, and to that alone, to address myself.

Now, let me give an illustration. I am at present one of the conferees on the rivers and harbors bill. The Senate is smaller than we are. They have 96 Members as against our 435. Their duties on committees are, consequently, very much greater. Take the situation: We found when we went over in conference that the members of the Senate committee did not know the facts, because they did not have the time to learn the facts. Now, how is it going to be humanly possible for the members of one committee to take all the proof that is required in order to learn, with patience and with diligence and with care, the basic facts upon which your appropriations ought to be made? Any man who has studied the work of these various committees knows that that can not be done.

Now, I want to go with the management of the House; I want to do what is the right thing to do. I am in favor of a budget plan, but it does seem to me that you do not, because you are going to take the step, have to jump at once from the top of a 17-story building down to the street. Why can you not try it out, at least, in this way—why can not you have the central committee determine the amount that can be spent by these various committees, and have the various committees take evidence, and then distribute those amounts? They can find the facts infinitely better than one committee can. And it is well said, too, that when you permit this central committee to put on it one or two men from these other committees, you are delegating to 2 men the work that is now performed by 21. And any man who has sat in these hearings knows that each one of the 21 contributes some individual thought. These men represent various parts of this Union. One man may not know about New Orleans, but another man may come from that vicinity and may understand the situation there. Another man may know about the California coast and about the situation there.

Mr. HICKS. Our colleague from New York [Mr. MAGEE] made a statement a moment ago that he felt the House was in honor bound to vote for this rule, because they voted for the budget system a day or two ago. My other colleague from New York can not agree with that suggestion, can he?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Why, I am in favor of the budget system which was adopted, as I have just said——

Mr. MAGEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Allow me to finish the sentence, please. But I am not in favor of the gentleman's method of carrying it out. I agree with him in principle. I do not think his plan is practical. I do not think it will work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRAGO). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I ask for one minute more.

Mr. FESS. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do think that the modified plan which I have suggested, the plan of allowing the central committee to determine and allot the amount, and then allow these several committees to distribute that amount, is practical. I believe that it will work. I believe it will bring the combined intellect, and combined effort, and combined knowledge of a large number, nearly 150 men, where otherwise you will have the judgment of only two or three men. And I think we want that combined intellect, that combined effort; I think we want that combined knowledge; and for that reason I am in favor of a modification of this rule.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that if the resolution is adopted there will be two hours, at least, of debate on the merits of it, I therefore move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Andrews, Md.	Elston	Kiess	Rhodes
Bacharach	Emerson	Kitchin	Riddick
Baer	Evans, Nev.	Kreider	Riordan
Booher	Ferris	Langley	Rowan

Drane	Kendall	Randall, Calif.	Watson
Echols	Kennedy, Iowa	Randall, Wis.	Yates
Ellsworth	Kettner	Reber	Young, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eleven Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending.

Mr. HAUGEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended one hour on the discussion of the rule, and that the time be equally divided between those for and against.

Mr. GOOD. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported from the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 69.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and eighty-seven Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of agreeing to the rule will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 158, nays 154, not voting 115, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. SLEMP (for) with Mr. RANDALL of California (against).

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota (for) with Mr. HASTINGS (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts with Mr. HARDY of Texas.

Mr. RODENBERG with Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana.

Mr. HARRELD with Mr. MCCLINTIC.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania with Mr. STEELE.

Mr. ELSTON with Mr. DRANE.

Mr. COLE with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. SNYDER with Mr. CARTER.

Mr. RHODES with Mr. TILLMAN.

Mr. LANGLEY with Mr. CLARK of Florida.

Mr. GOODALL with Mr. SHERWOOD.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota with Mr. SULLIVAN.

Mr. MASON with Mr. POU.

Mr. GARLAND with Mr. CARSS.

Mr. BACHARACH with Mr. SEARS.

Mr. WATSON with Mr. SMITHWICK.

Mr. RANDALL of Wisconsin with Mr. UPSHAW.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. SMALL.

Mr. HUTCHINSON with Mr. SCULLY.

Mr. VARE with Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi.

Mr. FREEMAN with Mr. MCLANE.

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. LESHER.

Mr. DALE with Mr. BRUMBAUGH.

Mr. MORAN with Mr. DEWALT.

Mr. CURRY of California with Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas.

Mr. ECHOLS with Mr. CANTRILL.

Mr. RIDDICK with Mr. LANKFORD.

Mr. COOPER with Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire if the gentleman from New York, Mr. HOUGHTON, is recorded as having voted on this roll call.

The SPEAKER. He is recorded as voting "nay."

Mr. PLATT. He is not present. He is out of town.

Mr. HICKS. He is not present. He went home Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York, Mr. HOUGHTON, present? The Chair being informed that he is not in the city, his vote will be stricken from the roll call. On this vote the yeas are 158, the nays 154, and the rule is agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this vote is so close that I ask for a recapitulation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a reasonable request. The Chair will direct a recapitulation of the vote.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry: On the recapitulation, can any Member change his vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he can.

The Clerk recapitulated the names of those voting.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the conferees on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 13266), I desire to report that the conferees have been unable to agree.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota presents a conference report for printing under the rule.

APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended one hour, and if that consent is granted I shall yield that amount of time to those opposed to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman designate to whom he is going to distribute the hour on the other side?

Mr. GOOD. I will yield to such persons as may be indicated, if gentlemen will have a list made.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the gentleman to change his request, so as to have the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] handle one-half of the time.

Mr. GOOD. I desire to retain the floor and the control of the resolution, but have no desire to yield the time during that hour to anyone except to those persons who are opposed to the resolution, and who may be agreed upon.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. Will not the gentleman yield one lump hour to some one who is opposed, so that he can distribute the time, and the gentleman from Iowa retain the other hour?

Mr. GOOD. I will say that if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will ask recognition for one hour—he is the ranking Member on that side—and he will yield, I understand, one-half of his time to some one on that side.

Mr. RUBEY. In addition to the amount you are asking for?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; so that we may have three hours.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] would not be entitled to recognition.

Mr. GOOD. He is the ranking Member on that side.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But he is not opposed to the resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much time would that give on the rule?

Mr. GOOD. That would give us two hours. Does the gentleman want further time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I just wanted to know what it was.

Mr. PADGETT. I understood the gentleman to say three hours a moment ago.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has made the suggestion that the gentleman from Tennessee, not being opposed to the resolution, would not be entitled to the floor. I desire to retain the floor for obvious reasons which the gentleman can well understand, but do not desire to cut off the debate in any way.

Mr. FIELDS. Then is not somebody who is opposed to the resolution entitled to that hour?

Mr. CALDWELL. Instead of yielding five minutes to one Member and six minutes to another Member, and so on, will not the gentleman yield one hour of his time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] controls the time, either one hour or two hours, and should yield to anyone to offer an amendment, would he not lose the floor?

The SPEAKER. He would.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. So that evidently the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] does not intend to permit anyone to offer an amendment?

Mr. GOOD. I understand there will be a motion to recommit which will embody the ideas of those opposed to the resolution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Somebody's ideas. I do not know whose.

Mr. PELL. Are you going to have two hours anyhow?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know whether there will be two hours general debate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request, that my time be extended by two hours, and with that understanding I will yield one-half of the time for debate to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], but not for offering amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Unless it carries with it the opportunity to offer amendments, I shall object. I do not think we should pass this resolution without the opportunity of offering amendments.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. This matter was discussed 12 years ago, and we spent months in the discussion, and now are we to dispose of this matter in a few minutes?

Mr. GOOD. I have tried to get three hours.

Mr. HAUGEN. And we considered it before for nearly three months.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman had better be thankful for what they will give him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the time be extended two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I shall object unless that carries with it the right to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my time be extended one hour, and I will yield one-half of that to the gentleman from Tennessee for discussion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his time be extended one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If it is to be simply for debate, I object.

Mr. GOOD. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois if he knows of any amendment that will be offered which will aid in perfecting the resolution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think most any amendment would aid in perfecting it. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 324.

Resolved, That the rules governing the procedure of the House of Representatives are hereby amended in the following manner:

Rule X: Clause 3 shall read as follows:

"3. On appropriations, to consist of 35 members."

Rule XI: Clauses 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, and 56 shall read as follows:

"3. To appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government—to the Committee on Appropriations.

"10. To agriculture and forestry—to the Committee on Agriculture.

"11. To the relations of the United States with foreign nations—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

"12. To the Military Establishment, including the increase or reduction of commissioned officers and enlisted men and their pay and allowances, the militia, and the public defense—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

"13. To the Naval Establishment, including the increase or reduction of commissioned officers and enlisted men and their pay and allowances and the increase of ships or vessels of all classes of the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

"14. To the post office and post roads—to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

"16. To the relations of the United States with the Indians and the Indian tribes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

"56. The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business; the Committee on Elections, on the right of a Member to his seat; the Committee on Ways and Means, on bills raising revenue; the Committee on Appropriations, the general appropriation bills; the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, bills authorizing the improvement of rivers and harbors; the Committee on the Public Lands, bills for the forfeiture of land grants to railroad and other corporations, bills preventing speculation in the public lands, and bills for the reservation of the public lands for the benefit of actual and bona fide settlers; the Committee on the Territories, bills for the admission of new States; the Committee on Enrolled Bills, enrolled bills; the Committee on Invalid Pensions, general pension bills; the Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses; and the Committee on Accounts, on all matters of expenditure of the contingent fund of the House."

Rule XX: Add an additional clause, as follows:

"2. Any amendment of the Senate to a general appropriation bill which would be in violation of the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, if said amendment had originated in the House, shall not be agreed to by the managers on the part of the House unless specific authority to agree to such amendment shall be first given by the House by a separate vote on every such amendment."

Rule XXI: Add an additional clause, as follows:

"5. No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction. A question of order on an appropriation in any such bill, joint resolution, or amendment thereto may be raised at any time."

This resolution shall take effect on July 1, 1920.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request that my time be extended for two hours, and if this is granted I will yield one half of the time to the gentleman from Tennessee. I make no reservation as to the right to amend. While I think it is ill advised, I do not want to be accused of taking snap judgment on a matter of so much importance.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman yields for an amendment, does he not lose the floor?

The SPEAKER. That is the rule—if he yields for an amendment he loses the floor, unless some agreement is made to the contrary.

Mr. GOOD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. If I yield an hour and a half to the gentleman from Tennessee and he offers an amendment, do I lose the balance of the time I have reserved?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not yield an hour and a half for he only has an hour.

Mr. GOOD. I am proceeding upon the theory that my time is extended two hours.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman yields one-half of his time and says that he makes no reservation as to amendments and an amendment is offered, he would lose the floor.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I couple with that the further request that I shall not lose the floor by reason of the fact that any Member may offer an amendment during the time that he is occupying the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object, we are considering this legislation——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this matter might be straightened out. I suggest that we have three hours' debate; that the gentleman yield an hour and a half of it to those opposed to it; that they can offer an amendment if they wish; and that the gentleman from Iowa have the right to move the previous question at the end of the three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota objected to that proposition, as the Chair understood.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not hear the proposition put before the House.

Mr. GOOD. What is the request the gentleman from Missouri makes?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The same request that was made before; that the gentleman from Iowa have his time extended to three hours for debate; that he yield one-half of it to those opposed; and that he have the right at the end of the three hours to move the previous question.

Mr. GOOD. That would be entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time be extended to three hours for debate, and during that time amendments may be offered, and that the gentleman from Iowa shall have the right at the end of the three hours to move the previous question on the amendments and resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, the Committee on Rules could have put that in the rule, but they did not do it. They put the rule through, now let them live up to it. I object.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the time has come when there should be some centralization of power in the legislative branch of the Government to regulate expenditures. We have just passed what is known as a budget law. We propose to regulate the conduct of the executive branch of the Government. That compels the executive branch of the Government to give to the Congress of the United States a photograph, if I may so speak, of its program for the entire year. Now, that program as photographed in the budget as presented by the President should be visualized by some central body in the Congress which will be able to prevent extravagant expenditures, and it will not do for us to say that we have performed our full duty when we have placed upon the executive branch of the Government obligations to show their entire program and at the same time say that we will not reform the legislative branch of the Government in such a way as to compel it to show its full program or policy.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield in five minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Have the gentleman from Iowa grant you more time.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not believe he will; he can not in an hour. I maintain that it is an impossibility with eight great appropriating committees, which travel in different directions, to visualize the financial situation of the Nation and to correlate the great work of reform which must be recognized as needed to keep the expenses of the Government within the revenues.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I can not yield in five minutes. I maintain, further, that unless this resolution be adopted, we will have failed in the performance of one of the most important duties ever imposed upon Congress. The time has come when economy must be the watchword, and that watchword must be maintained through some central organization of this House which will be able to write the word economy into law, and you will not be able to do that unless you adopt this resolution. Thirty-five men working through subcommittees will be able to get all the information from the various departments which will enable them to so appropriate the money paid into the Treasury by the people as to work out the best possible means of economy. Only a few years ago we had but 300,000 taxpayers who paid money directly into the Treasury of the United States. To-day we have 3,400,000, and it will not be long before we have 5,000,000, and these 5,000,000 taxpayers are all alert to the need for economy. Extravagance such as has never been known before has existed throughout the Nation for a long period, and to-day we are confronted with a deficit now carried in Treasury certificates of more than $3,500,000,000. It is only by the most rigid system of economy that we can hope to pay this deficit with the revenues at our command. We can not afford to add to the further burdens of the taxpaying public. We must give them assurance of our sincerity in the claim that we are for an economical, efficient conduct of Government affairs, and unless we register our votes in favor of this resolution we will have said by our action that we are not in favor of economical reform in Government. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I had cherished the hope and belief that the question of autocracy, either by way of a change in the rules of this House or otherwise, a proposition thrashed out on this floor, voted on by the people, fought out 140 years ago, and again recently in France, one universally repudiated by the American people, had been forgotten. To my surprise, notwithstanding the fact that autocracy is generally looked upon with scorn and contempt, it appears here in a more malignant form than ever.

First, the stepping stone, the camouflage, the so-called budget bill, which, of course, has nothing to do with this proposition—the change in rules. The budget bill is one thing. It has reference to the preparation of the estimates or a budget by the executive branch of the Government. This is another. This change in the rules of the House has reference to the legislative branch; that is, it has reference to how appropriations shall be disposed of in the House. The question is, Shall 35 Members be given jurisdiction over appropriations instead of the 153 Members that now have jurisdiction over them? That is autocracy as against democracy, pure and simple.

My colleague, Mr. GOOD, stated:

We not only make the President responsible for the amount asked for to run the Government, but we give the machinery.

When asked the question as to what extent it changes the responsibility of the President, the gentleman avoided the question. The Constitution defines the duties of Congress as well as the duties of the President. It is the duty of Congress to enact laws and to appropriate money. As everybody knows, not one dollar can be legally taken from the Treasury without authority by law. It is the duty of the President to administer the law, to expend the money in accordance with the acts of Congress, and from time to time to give the Congress information and recommend to its consideration such measure as he shall judge necessary and expedient. Thus the duties have been defined. It is unnecessary to say that Congress has not the sole power to change the Constitution, so nothing has been added to nor detracted from the prerogatives of either by the proposed legislation. All there is to it, is that a simple duty has been performed. If the necessary machinery has not been provided for in the past, this is an acknowledgment of a dereliction of duty imposed upon Congress. It is either that, or it is camouflage, pure and simple. In the past the budgets, or the estimates, it matters not by which name you call them, have been made up and submitted, first, by the bureau chiefs; next, scrutinized and passed upon by the Secretaries for their respective departments; then by the Cabinet, including the President of the United States; and finally submitted to Congress. It is now proposed that one Secretary shall be given jurisdiction in the matter. If one Secretary can do better than ten Secretaries in preparing them, well and good. Nobody cares particularly whether estimates or budgets are prepared by one or ten Secretaries, just so that they are prepared properly. If the machinery proposed would improve upon the present system, nobody can nor should object. But here we have another question—the change in rules—one which has nothing to do with what has been done. It is now proposed to give 35 Members absolute jurisdiction over practically all the appropriations. The resolution provides that—

No bill or joint resolution carrying appropriations shall be reported by any committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, nor shall an amendment proposing an appropriation be in order during the consideration of a bill or joint resolution reported by a committee not having that jurisdiction; that a point of order may be raised against it at any time.

That simply means that the membership of the House surrenders its jurisdiction and power over appropriations.

There can be no question about the meaning of the resolution. The question then is, Can one committee of 35 members do or accomplish more in the direction of economy, justice, and a businesslike administration of the affairs of this Government than the seven committees with a membership of 22 members each now provided for by the present rules? If it is to be admitted that the committees to be dispensed with, consisting of 154, including the great Committee on Appropriations, have failed in their effort to properly and judiciously appropriate public money, I do not believe that anyone is egotistical enough to claim that a committee with a membership of 35, in all probabilities made up largely from the membership of the Committee on Appropriations, can accomplish more than the 154 members on the seven committees at present. If the Congress is guilty of dereliction of its duty, incompetency, prejudice, or discrimination in appropriating public money, what should be done to correct it? If guilty of one or the other or all, the only remedy, of course, is at the polls. It is then for the public to elect men of the highest type of character; men with business training and experience. I for one do not subscribe to the insinuation conveyed in the resolution, for in my opinion the remedy is in providing for the adequate number of committees, thus making it possible to carefully scrutinize and pass upon every item, so that every dollar of the public funds may be properly appropriated and expended.

In my opinion we should have cooperation. Representatives of appropriating committees should confer and fix the limit of appropriations to be made by each committee. Or the steering committee should be given authority, under the rules, to do what it is doing. As you know, the steering committee during the present session gave consideration to the estimates submitted and after taking into consideration the condition of the Treasury and the heavy demands upon it recommended large decreases—I believe an average of 27 per cent in all estimates made.

A decrease of 20 per cent in the estimates for the Department of Agriculture was suggested. This was carried out by the committee and the House. Larger decreases were suggested to other committees, which I believe were carried out. As a result, a systematic, business way of handling appropriations has not only been worked out but has been effectively carried out.

In my opinion, we should have at least one appropriating committee for each of the 10 executive departments of our Government; besides, the committee having jurisdiction over pensions, whose members are naturally more familiar with the laws and administration of the laws of the Pension Bureau than any others, should be given authority to appropriate for pensions. What is true of the Committee on Pensions is also true as to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Public Buildings and Grounds, Claims, War Claims, the District of Columbia, and others. Under such arrangement or rules we could look forward to appropriations being dealt with intelligently and in a comprehensive manner, instead of by lump-sum appropriations which the proposed plan necessarily will force Congress to resort to. We could look for legislation which would specify how and where money was to be expended, the salaries, and the number of employees to be employed.

To illustrate, not to reflect upon any committee nor to take any credit to myself, but to point out results obtained, the Agricultural appropriation bill, which I recently reported, appropriated $33,900,211 for the current year and carried 6,033 positions on the statutory roll. Twenty-two industrious members of the Committee on Agriculture gave not only days and weeks but months in most careful consideration of that bill. Every item was carefully scrutinized and considered by the full committee, by a subcommittee, and again by the full committee. Reported to the House; considered by the Committee of the Whole; passed by the House; considered by the Senate committee, a subcommittee, the full committee; considered and passed by the Senate; considered in conference; again passed by the two Houses and finally approved by the President.

Compare it with bills reported by the Appropriations Committee. Seven bills under its jurisdiction—fortification, pension, sundry civil, second deficiency, third deficiency, railroad deficiency, war-risk insurance, and pension deficiency—appropriated $1,945,489,013.06. The total number of clerks carried on the statutory rolls in those bills was only 2,281. The amount of appropriation carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill was only 1.7 per cent of the appropriation carried in the seven bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations, yet the number of clerks carried on the statutory roll of the Agricultural bill was nearly three times the number of clerks carried on the statutory rolls of the seven bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations. We have spent weeks, yes, months, in fighting lump-sum appropriations in an effort to safeguard the Treasury, to exercise our rights and power, to specify and direct where and how the money should be expended, and to determine what salaries should be paid and the number of employees to be employed.

The failure of the Appropriations Committee is not a subject for adverse criticism. The fault is not with the committee; the fault is with Congress in overloading that committee with work. Its members have undoubtedly worked night and day. Its members possess industry, intelligence, and ability, but they are overworked. As everybody knows, it is a physical and mental impossibility for them to give due and proper consideration to all the matters that come under their jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to say that it is further imposing upon them by adding these innumerable responsibilities. The proper safeguarding of the Treasury and the wise expenditure of public moneys can not be expected under the proposed system. It will spell ruin and disaster, as it has in every country where it has been tried. I refer you to the results obtained in England, Germany, and other places where it has been tried.

The natural instinct of mankind is greed for power. True, it manifests itself more in some than in others, but as a general thing all are inflicted with the same disease; all are made out of the same clay. That unfortunate trait of character, that greed for power and usurpation of power, has caused more wars and trouble than any other thing. That was true in the days of barbarism; it is true in our day—and always will be true. It was true of the pirates of old. By the might of their sword they conquered and dethroned rulers, dictated terms to popes and emperors, they fought both for and against the liberty of man. People who had been Christianized fled in terror. England, Ireland, Scotland, France, Spain, Italy—yes, all the European nations—suffered. I need not refer to the constant warfare in Mexico, south of us, nor to the lives and property sacrificed recently in France as the result of that irresistible greed for power. Nor to Washington and his band of noble patriots who fought and died that there might be freedom of thought and action, that we might enjoy the blessings of independence and personal freedom.

Fortunately or unfortunately, I am a descendant of a people recorded in history as possessed of great love for freedom and personal independence. History tells us that to be free and independent has always been their greatest desire and ambition; that they would endure the rigid climate of the north; that they would suffer inconvenience, privation, poverty, and distress; that they would make the forest their habitation; but that they would never give up one inch of their right as freemen. Their love for personal independence amounted to passion. No king or ruler has ever been able for any length of time to be absolute master over them. No foreign nation has been powerful enough to subjugate them. They dethroned their obstinate monarchs. They dared to draw the sword against Europe and demand national independence, and it was given them. In their dispute of only a few years ago let it be said to their honor and credit that differences were amicably adjusted without drawing a sword, firing a gun, or the spilling of a drop of blood. It may be that I am too sensitive about the surrender of my personal rights and the rights of those whom I have the honor to represent, but when I think of the sacrifices made to establish and maintain a democratic form of Government, of which we all boast, the sacrifices made to stamp out autocracy in the world; when I think of the fierce fight that took place in this Chamber some 12 years ago over autocracy; when I think of those excellent men that contended for one-man rule, who, as a result, found their political carcasses outside of the breastwork the morning after election; when I think of the universal condemnation and repudiation of autocratic rules at the polls; when I think of our good friend Uncle JOE out in the cold and Speaker CLARK ushered into the Speaker's chair, in full control, with his able lieutenant, the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD; when I think of the Republican Party shorn of power eight long and lean years, all as a result of autocratic rule and concentration of one-man power, which, by the way, was insignificant with what is proposed to-day, for all the evil things committed or possible to commit under autocratic rules were, in my opinion, only a drop in the bucket as compared with the rule suggested to-day; and when I think of our sad experience as a result of the error made then, need I say that I feel justified in raising my voice in opposition, and that I am surprised and dumfounded to find that after 15 short months of Republican control of Congress it is suggested by members of my party to repeat the error? I have been told that there are Democratic Members who profited so much by the error previously made that they are contemplating aiding in the adoption of the proposed autocratic rule. Can it be that the heroic fight made by the distinguished Member from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and his associates was a mere sham?

If an autocratic rule was bad then, why should it be tolerated now? What has taken place? Why should our form of government be changed? Why should 435 Members surrender their rights, power, and prerogatives to 35 Members now? Is it for the purpose, as stated by one Member, to put the Republican Members in the hole? The fight over the rule put not only Republicans but Democrats as well in the hole before. Republicans and Democrats alike will, of course, have to answer to their constituents for this change of heart, and the voter at the polls will, as in the past, record his solemn judgment in the matter. If we judge the present by the past, personal independence and the principle for which our forefathers fought and died are as sacred to the American voter to-day as ever. He will understand that we, as representatives of the people, in surrendering our rights, surrender the rights of those whom we have the honor to represent. He will determine and insist that his Representative and every Member of this House have and exercise the right granted under our Constitution, not only in respect to appropriations but in every other matter affecting the welfare of the American people.

If this change in the rules of the House should be adopted and jurisdiction over all appropriations given to one committee with a membership of 35, what would be the result? The committee would, undoubtedly, be made up of most capable and excellent members. I assume that the committee on committees would assert its rights to make the appointments, and would follow the usual rule of reappointing at least most of the members of the present Appropriations Committee. If so, and if we judge by the past, there is danger of important matters being overlooked. Take, for instance, the Department of Agriculture. I speak of that department because I am more familiar with it than other departments. Under the present rules of the House deficiencies go to the Committee on Appropriations. According to a statement furnished me by that department, the following deficiency estimates were submitted to the Committee on Appropriations and action taken as indicated:

	Estimates.	Amount reported.
Japanese beetle	$200,000.00	(1)
Cold-storage items	253,000.00	(1)
Corn borer	500,000.00	(1)
Printing and binding	125,000.00	$75,000.00
Crop estimates, for envelopes	1,382.56	1,382.56
Fighting and preventing fires	2,500,000.00	(1)
Biological Survey, general expenses	36,271.50	(1)
States Relations Service, station at Guam	5,000.00	(1)
Relief J. W. Harrold, for building rent	111.42	111.42
Total	3,620,765.48	76,493.98

[1] Nothing.

Other departments submitted estimates. Mr. Hines asked for $700,000,000 deficit for the Railroad Administration, an amount twenty times as great as the total annual appropriation for the Department of Agriculture. Only $76,493.98 of the $3,620,765.48 asked for was granted to the Department of Agriculture, but the $700,000,000 was not only cheerfully granted the Railroad Administration but rushed through with the greatest speed, and thus $700,000,000 was extracted from the Treasury. On the other hand, we have the meager sum of $76,493.98 out of the $3,620,765.48 asked for in the interest of 6,000,000 farmers and 6,000,000 laborers tilling 6,000,000 farms, producing 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn and 5,600,000,000 bushels of cereals, which is about one-third of the production of cereals in the world, to feed not only our people but the people of the world. That was swept aside, but when it came to the item of paying profits, under the guise of compensation, to the railroads—as, for instance, to the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, more than 22 per cent; the Chicago & Erie, more than 70 per cent; the Duluth, Missabe & Northern Railway Co., more than 114 per cent; the Colorado & Wyoming Railroad Co., more than 162 per cent; and the Bessemer & Lake Erie Railroad Co., more than 647 per cent—they paid in many instances annual profits, or so-called compensation, many times the railroad's capital stock and all the water added. If we are to judge by the past, it is unnecessary to prophesy what will become of the farmer, whom all profess to admire and praise just before election.

Under the proposed rule a number of committees are given jurisdiction over legislation but not over appropriations to enforce or execute legislation. Legislation is dependent upon appropriations. Without appropriations to enforce laws they are of no value. For instance, a number of years ago we enacted laws providing for meat inspection, but the committees failed to appropriate for their enforcement. As a result of this failure the small and independent packers were idle. Without the Federal inspection they were unable to operate their plants. Later a three million permanent annual appropriation was provided for, and the number of plants have since increased more than 1,000 per cent. As stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], the bonus bill carried no appropriation. Of what value will the law be unless the money is made available? The debate and vote on the bonus bill recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD sets lights on that. Thus I might go on.

Reference has been made to work of the committees. Acting upon suggestions made, I desire to refer, briefly, to the work done by the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor to be chairman, not in a spirit of boasting but merely to state facts.

In addition to the two appropriation bills enacted, the committee has reported, amended, and had passed more legislation during this Congress, in a period of 13 months, than that committee has done in the preceding 13 years. The fact is it has amended in this Congress practically every bill enacted by that committee in the past 13 years.

The committee reported the Agricultural appropriation bill for 1920 which has been enacted (Public, No. 22, 66th Cong., H. R. 7413), left over from the Sixty-fifth Congress. It carried $33,900,211 appropriation and considerable new legislation, as, for instance, the following clauses: A clause amending the pure food and drugs act so as to require the marking of the net weight on wrapped hams and bacon, which guarantees full weight to the consumer and obviates much deception. A clause requiring the inspection and marking of horse meat shipped in interstate commerce, which brings horse meat under the meat-inspection law and affords protection to the consumer using it. A clause amending the United States warehouse act. A clause extending the Weeks Act by providing appropriation to purchase forest lands under that act. A clause providing for the enforcement of the Government regulations and the handling of the wool clip of 1918, under which large sums unjustly withheld have been collected by the Government and are being distributed among the producers of the wool who are justly entitled to the same. And probably the most important, the clause repealing the so-called daylight-saving law. As you will recall after a long and fierce contest the so-called daylight-saving law, which worked such an inconvenience, hardship, and injustice to the farmers and city people as well, was repealed, the repeal vetoed by the President and finally passed over the President's veto.

The committee reported the so-called food-control amendments and the District of Columbia rents act, which has been enacted (Public, No. 63, 66th Cong., H. R. 8624). The amendments, though to a temporary measure, permit collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them, which relieves farmers from persecution and unwarranted prosecution so unjustly imposed on them from coast to coast. This right to collective bargaining by farmers it is now proposed by the Volstead bill to make permanent legislation. True, the prosecution was generally instigated by State prosecuting attorneys, but in a few instances Federal authorities joined with them. Farmers have been compelled to fight lawsuits, at great expense, to justify or defend their right to make collective sales. For instance, farmers in California engaged in making collective sales of milk were arrested and indicted. They were tried and were promptly acquitted. They were not prosecuted for profiteering, but for simply disposing of their farm products by collective sales. In the fall of 1917 the organization of farmers in Illinois that supplied the Chicago district with milk were indicted and, after being put to a large expense in defending their rights, were acquitted. We find that in instances the third degree was applied in police circles, evidently for the purpose of frightening and embarrassing the farmers hauled into court. In Ohio men of standing, occupying high positions in their localities, were taken out of their beds in the middle of the night, placed in jail, and, as stated by Mr. John Miller in his testimony, they were put into a hospital ward reeking with vermin. In the morning they had breakfast brought in that, both from its quality and from the containers in which it was brought, they could not taste or touch. In January, 1918, officers of farm organizations were indicted, though more courteously treated; they were required to give bail at a premium of $200 or $300 to the surety company. It cost them $15,000 to fight their way out of the trouble. What was true in the cases referred to was also true in others. So far as I know, in every instance all were acquitted. Evidently the prosecution was not to prevent profiteering but simply to persecute.

The amendments reported by the committee also brought wearing apparel and containers of food, feeds, and fertilizers under the provisions of the food-control act, and also attached a penalty for the violation of section 4 of the act, which makes profiteering, hoarding, and destruction of necessities unlawful. The amendments in addition carried the District of Columbia rents act, which created a rent commission to regulate rents in the District of Columbia. This commission has heard hundreds of complaints and has adjusted numerous rent controversies within the District of Columbia, thus saving the tenants from the clutches of the profiteers.

The committee has reported a bill dealing with the supply and price of sugar, which has been enacted (Public, No. 109, 66th Cong., S. 3284). As you will recall, the President had the power and money to control the price and supply of sugar through the United States Sugar Equalization Board, incorporated in the State of Delaware, with a capital stock of $5,000,000, subscribed and paid for out of the President's fund. You will also recall that the Sugar Equalization Board procured the 1919 crop at $5.50 a hundred, $1.54 added for refining, which allowed the sale of sugar on the part of the refiners at 9 cents a pound, less 38 cents per hundred pounds retained by the Sugar Equalization Board. The result of the functioning of this board brought about the staple price to the consumer of 10 cents per pound and a fairly equitable distribution of sugar. You will further recall that on July 29 the Cuban sugar producers offered to sell the Cuban crop for 1920 at a moderate price, a proposition which was given consideration by the Sugar Equalization Board; that on August 14, 1919, the board addressed the President by letter and memorandum recommending that negotiations be entered into to procure the Cuban sugar crop of 1920; that no action was taken by the President; that the board, again on September 20, addressed another communication to the Chief Executive, stating that the time was fast approaching, if it had not arrived, when we would be unable to control the Cuban crop of sugar for 1920 unless action was taken, also calling attention to the fact that a considerable tonnage of Cuban sugar had already been sold and recommending prompt action; that the communication was acknowledged September 22; that on the following day the board again transmitted a letter to the President, advising him that inasmuch as no action had been taken by him concerning these negotiations, the situation was then being called to the attention of Congress. It is needless to say that had the President availed himself of the opportunity to buy the Cuban crop at the price offered with the money and organization made available and at his command he would have saved the consumer from paying the exorbitant prices exacted, and had he purchased the Cuban crop instead of permitting the establishment of zones—one along the Atlantic coast, where the price of sugar was fixed at 9 cents to wholesalers; another in the beet-sugar district, where the price was fixed at 10½ cents a pound; and another down South in the cane-sugar district, where the price was fixed at 18 cents and where the Attorney General, on November 8, 1919, gave his official approval to the establishment of a price of 17 cents per pound for Louisiana prime yellow clarified sugar, and 18 cents per pound for Louisiana clear granulated sugar, net the plantation, which price it was held would eliminate any possibility of successful prosecution—the situation would be different. It is unnecessary to say that had the President exercised his power, what seems to have been a plain duty, and had it not been for the apparent discrimination permitted in favor of the Louisiana cane growers, we would have had not only an ample supply of sugar but sugar at half the price the consumer has been compelled to pay. But inasmuch as the President did not exercise a power which he has had all the time since July 15, 1918, nor follow the recommendations and suggestions made by the Sugar Equalization Board, and also conveyed in the bill passed, of course, no relief was obtained. Nevertheless, the legislation was timely and proper, and should have been carried out, so that the many millions in profit exacted by the profiteers would have been saved to the consumer.

The committee reported the cold-storage bill (H. R. 9521), which has been passed both by the House and Senate, which limits the time foods can be held in cold storage to one year by prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of any food that has been held in cold storage for a longer period. It also contains a number of admirable features, such as the one regulating the sanitary conditions of the cold-storage warehouses, and provisions requiring a report on all foods held in cold storage, which will afford accurate information as to the food supply on hand, information as to hoarding, holding, and manipulation of prices, and will permit the officials enforcing the act to secure strict compliance with its provisions.

The committee has reported a bill amending the pure food and drugs act, known as the slack package bill (H. R. 10311), so as to prohibit the use of slack-filled or other deceptive forms of packages. The bill when enacted will remove from the market the type of slack-filled packages used in the marketing of spices, cereals, and like articles which are only partly filled with food—in some instances but one-third of their true capacity. These containers mislead the consumer by exacting from him a price based on the appearance rather than the true quantity thus packaged. They also promote unfair competition, in that the trade dealing with honestly filled packages is, of course, detrimentally affected. Another type of fraudulent package or container which it will do away with is the type which gives the purchaser a false impression as to the quantity, quality, size, kind, or origin of the food contained therein, as, for instance, bottles with inverted bottoms, bottles made of thickened glass for olives or fruit, especially designed to magnify the size of the individual olive. Other forms of deception which will also be removed are the containers of canned foods which contain an excess of liquid, such as water or sirup, and types that contain foreign matter and a deficiency of food material, and also those that by means of pictures or representations printed on the outside convey a false impression to the purchaser as to their contents.

The committee has reported a bill to loan to farmers in drought and storm-stricken sections $2,000,000 for the purchase of seed (H. R. 11312). It authorizes loans through national or State banks not to exceed $300 to one farmer, the loan to be secured, as far as practicable, by a first lien on the crop planted with the seed so secured.

The committee has reported a bill authorizing the acquisition of the experiment vineyards near Fresno and Oakville, Calif. (H. R. 13402), which vineyards contain valuable plantings.

The committee has reported a resolution defining what constitutes a crop failure under the rules and regulations issued by departments of the Government in making loans of seed wheat to farmers for crop purposes (H. J. Res. 307). The contract made in making these loans by the Federal farm-loan banks shows that it was the intention of the contract, although it does not clearly state the fact, that those who produced less than 5 bushels per acre were to have their notes returned, but in the absence of specific language to that effect the farmer could not be relieved. This resolution was incorporated in the Agricultural appropriation bill for 1921, which has been enacted and is now law.

The committee reported the Agricultural appropriation bill for 1921, which has been enacted (Public, No. 234, 66th Cong., H. R. 12272). It appropriates $31,714,784 for the Department of Agriculture. The bill for 1921 eliminates and reduces many useless appropriations, while, on the other hand, it increases many items of importance under which valuable work is being done by the department. As a whole it carries a reduction of $2,185,327 under the bill for 1920. This economy is manifestly in the interest of the country's welfare and proper during this period of critical stress. The bill carries important legislation, as, for instance, the following clauses: The extension of the plant quarantine act to the District of Columbia. Amendments to the cotton-futures act, making permanent the amendments to that act reducing the number of grades deliverable on a contract which were carried in the wheat-guaranty act, a temporary measure. The transfer to the Department of Agriculture of the reindeer work in Alaska, which is the chief source of food supply of Alaska and is fast becoming its chief industry. The transfer from the Department of the Treasury to the Department of Agriculture of the duty of enforcing the tea-importation act, which properly lodges it under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, under whose jurisdiction comes the enforcement of legislation affecting all food, as well as that affecting and assisting the farmer in production. The bill also creates a short-time rural credits committee, consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, and the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the two Houses, and two other members of each of said committees, to investigate and report on the practicability of establishing a system of short-time rural credits in the United States, which, it is needless to say, would be of great benefit, especially to certain sections of the country.

The committee has held hearings on the subject of meat-packing legislation, covering a period of a month and a half, and since the hearings a subcommittee has drafted a bill which proposes to regulate the meat-packing industry, as well as the stockyards, commission men, and traders, which it has reported back to the full committee. The full committee has taken action making the bill reported by the subcommittee the unfinished business of the committee, and has determined that it shall take precedence over other legislation before it until finally disposed of by the committee. In view of the action taken, the legislation should be reported to the House early in the forthcoming session.

The committee has before it a number of other important matters. I have prepared a commercial feed bill which will, if enacted into law, give to the purchaser full and accurate information as to the composition and ingredients of all commercial feed, its nutritive value, and protect him against deception and fraud. I have also prepared a fertilizer bill which will, if enacted into law, accomplish similar results in respect to fertilizers. These bills will be called up for consideration at the earliest opportunity. There are various other important measures pending, too numerous to refer to here.

The committee has held 86 days of reported hearings during the past year, and has been in session, with practically full attendance, from 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning until 6 or 7 o'clock in the evening nearly every day since the convening of the present Congress, except when it has had bills up for consideration on the floor, which accounts for the failure of any of its members to answer to all roll calls. The printed hearings on 20 different subjects before the committee up to date cover 5,891 pages.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have heard a number of reasons presented in opposition to the adoption of this resolution. I have heard none more earnestly presented than those presented by my distinguished friend from Iowa, Mr. HAUGEN, who has just taken his seat. He seems to have worked himself into a condition of mind where he thinks this is a question which involves the absolute liberty and freedom of the membership of the House. That to me is a novel proposition. My idea is that a committee is simply the servant of the House, and the House always has jurisdiction and authority over its committees. After all, the House names the membership of its various committees, and I can not see where any question of the freedom of individual membership in this body is involved in this proposition. Your Budget Committee has presented the resolution as its final recommendation in order to carry out what it believes is the wish of the House and the wish of the people of the country, to have a complete, rounded budget system, and in the very limited time that I have I wish to call the attention of my Democratic friends to a declaration made in the national Democratic platform which was adopted at St. Louis in 1916. I may say to my Republican friends that their national convention adopted a plank in its platform very similar to it. The Democratic plank reads as follows:

> We demand careful economy in all expenditures for the support of the Government and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided. We favor this as a practicable first step toward a budget system.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I have not the time, I am sorry to say. This resolution simply carries out that plank in the platform adopted at St. Louis in 1916, and unless we vote for this resolution I respectfully submit to my Democratic friends that we will not be supporting the platform upon which we were elected and to which we pledged allegiance. Now, under this resolution all of these appropriation bills would be presented to the House as a part of one great budget bill. In other words, instead of having 13 regular annual supply bills brought in here from time to time, we will have one great bill proposed by whatever committee this House may select to prepare and present it, and the House will have before it in one bill and at one time all of the proposed expenditures of the Government during the next fiscal year. The House, in addition to that, under the law previously passed, will have before it a statement from the President of the United States showing just what revenues are expected to be derived during the coming fiscal year and what revenues it will be necessary to raise in order to meet those proposed expenditures, and I wish to say, gentlemen, that in my judgment you will never have real, true economy until we get all of these appropriation bills in one committee. That does not mean that every member of an appropriating committee, whether he is on the Committee on Appropriations or any other appropriating committee, believes in economy, nor does it mean that those who are not on appropriating committees do not believe in economy, but I insist that you should have one appropriating committee with no legislative power in order to bring about the greatest amount of economy—a committee which is not predisposed by association or otherwise in favor of any particular department, but with the duty of taking all the departments into consideration at one and the same time. I think you will then have that sort of a situation whereby you will have a budget that will really amount to something. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SANFORD). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. We ought to have a quorum here for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 297 Members have responded to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I feel every one in the House is actuated with a desire to economize in Federal expenditures and in favor of a budget system, but I think in viewing this matter, as all other matters, we should look to the practical side as well as the theoretical side of the particular proposition submitted. Let us take one phase of the situation, and that is all I can take up in the short time allotted to me. Let me state emphatically that I favor a budget system. My difference is not with the principle involved, but in the method of accomplishing it. This rule provides for the creation of an appropriation committee consisting of 35 members. The Committee on Appropriations, as now constituted, deals with six different propositions and reports six different bills. If this rule prevails, there will be given to that appropriation committee 6 additional bills, making 12 altogether, over which they will have jurisdiction with power to consider and report to this House. If the membership of the committee is made 35 in number, then we have got two mathematical propositions before us. If each subcommitteeman is to serve on but one committee, then with 12 bills to be considered and 35 members to be divided up it is clear that the subcommittees could not have more than three members. If the subcommittees are to be larger, then each member of the Appropriation Committee will have to serve on more than one subcommittee and be conversant with more than one subject, and I respectfully submit that it will be a physical and mental impossibility for that man to consider properly the subject under advisement, with the result that the amounts will largely be directed and controlled by the departments, which already possess too much power.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. In a moment. Therefore it resolves itself into this proposition, as I see it: That each subcommittee will be composed of three members only, and we commit ourselves, if this rule prevails, to saying that three members of the Appropriations Committee are more competent and more able to determine on these great appropriation matters than are 21 members who now constitute these committees. I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, it is not practicable and is not feasible to suppose that 3 members are superior in intellect to 21 members. I doubt also the advisability of concentrating into a small body of men the great power exercised by the independent committees as they now exist, and whose membership gives its entire time to the subject with which they have long been familiar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not true if this rule is adopted that the commissioner of the budget in the Treasury Department will frame the bills so that this appropriation committee will have very little to do except simply to approve the estimates as made up by an executive officer, thus affording no opportunity for a Member to present the claims of the people of his district to a committee, as he can do at present?

Mr. HICKS. Yes, probably; and I wish to make this further observation: If I have the time, I imagine—I do not want to make that statement positively—but I imagine these subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations are now, in practice, separate and independent committees, that have very little to do with each other in making up the various bills reported from the Committee on Appropriations, and therefore do not coordinate appropriations as claimed. [Applause.]

Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker, that I am opposed to the budget system. Let me repeat that I am heartily in favor of changing the present method in the interest of economy and efficiency, but I am opposed to the plan as suggested and think a better one can be devised. I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota will offer a motion to recommit, which embodies a proposition which I feel will accomplish the desired result without losing the advantages now possessed in having the present committee.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do not belong to any committee that has the power of making appropriations. In fact, I do not belong to any important committee except the Committee on Revision of the Laws, which is performing a single task. I think, therefore, that being in a detached position, I am perhaps able to take an unprejudiced and, I hope, a somewhat judicial view of this subject.

There seem to be two arguments against the bill: First, that the proposed committee will be physically unable to perform the work assigned it. Having kept up to some extent with the business handled by the various committees that are entitled to report appropriations, I do not believe that there is any force at all in that argument. Another argument is that the Committee on Appropriations constituted as proposed will be in position to exercise autocratic authority. But it will be a mere agent of the House and within the control of the House, and it will be much easier to recall the action now contemplated, if that should hereafter be thought desirable, than it is now to pass this bill and concentrate all of the work of appropriations in the hands of a single committee. A committee of 35 will be so completely under the dominion of the House that the House can make at any time any change it may think proper.

It has seemed to me during my short service in Congress that there is great necessity for the concentration of administrative work, and while, of course, appropriations have technically a legislative character, they are in substance administrative in a large sense. The Ways and Means Committee provide for raising the revenue and appropriations simply represent the disposition of the revenue.

We have passed a budget bill which not only recognizes the necessity of consolidating but which actually consolidates. It consolidates the estimates and it consolidates the audit transactions. That is done in the interest of economy. Why should we stop and hesitate when in the interest of economy it is proposed we shall centralize the appropriation transactions? I believe if we stop short of doing that we will have an imperfect and incongruous budget system, and deviate from everything that has been done in the way of budget legislation in other bodies. Nearly all the States have adopted budget plans, and they have thrown appropriations into the hands of single committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. DUPRÉ. And there are 48 States in the Union.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask for one minute further.

Mr. GOOD. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The man who gave the strongest testimony, based upon his own study and investigation, before the special budget committee was Mr. Willoughby. He has favorably commented upon the Virginia plan recently adopted. In forming that plan there was no thought whatever of centralizing as to estimates and centralizing as to audits and not centralizing as to the work of the general assembly. And I may say—this illustration may not be impressive, because the difference, of course, is very great between the House of Representatives and one of the branches of a State legislature—that some years ago I happened to serve in the Senate of Virginia, and as a member of the committee that dealt with finances and appropriations, if we had diffused instead of concentrating, we could not have gotten through the difficulties confronting us at that time. Why, it is a common-sense proposition, which, it seems to me, the man in the street will recognize, and everybody ought to recognize, that the diffusion here tends against economy and to that extravagance we all are so anxious to avoid and so constantly endeavoring to eliminate.

This is one of the important bills the House ought to pass, and if it should be found later that a mistake has been made it will be in the province of the House to go back to the old system, which almost everybody admits is a bad one. It is a bad system and here is the chance to correct it.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, what is the object of a legislative budget? It is to permit a coordination of the expenditures of the Government and at the same time to enable a majority to carry out a party policy, whether that policy be one of retrenchment or expansion. Now, is it necessary, in order to carry out that general principle, to go as far as this proposition proposes to go? I am in favor of a scheme which will permit that thing to be done, but I do not believe that it is necessary in order to do it to hand to a single committee of the House the entire appropriating jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States. What do we do in this House? How do we spend the most of our time? Seventy per cent of all the time you and I spend in this House is spent on appropriation bills.

If this resolution is adopted, 35 men out of 435 will be in charge of bills on the floor of this House 70 per cent of all the time that we are here. This resolution proposes to increase the Appropriations Committee from 21 members to 35 members. At present the Appropriations Committee reports about 40 per cent of the total appropriations. This resolution proposes that 14 additional men shall consider the other 60 per cent. That means that 35 men will do 50 per cent more work than 21 do now; that 35 men will do the work which is now done by 189 Members of the House. I submit that that is a centralization of authority which is both unwise and unnecessary. If this new appropriation committee is created and divided up into subcommittees, it can not very well be divided into subcommittees larger than three or five. I submit these subcommittees can not be representative either of party division or of the difference of opinion over a country as large as this, nor can it be representative of the viewpoints of 435

Members. Whenever these subcommittees report to the main committee that committee will be so large that it can not possibly give to the details of appropriation the consideration which the appropriation committees of the House now give them.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I have only five minutes.

If I have an opportunity, I shall offer a motion to recommit, which I think will accomplish all that is desirable or necessary to accomplish in the way of coordination or economy. The motion which I shall offer creates a budget committee composed of the chairman and ranking majority member of each of the appropriating committees, and the ranking minority member of each of the appropriating committees. This committee is clothed with the power to consider the budget in its aggregate and to apportion the aggregate amount of expenditures among the appropriating committees. The rule prohibits any of the committees having the authority to report appropriations from reporting an amount in excess of the amount which they are authorized to report by the budget committee. That will give an opportunity for the chairman and the ranking members of each appropriating committee to get together with the chairman and ranking member of the Appropriations Committee and to consider the whole situation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. GOOD. My time is all taken.

Mr. CANNON. I was going to ask unanimous consent to ask one question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to ask a question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. If it be good policy to make these committees recommend appropriations, why should not we equalize the 40 committees and let us have a genuine democracy?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. CANNON. I am talking about making all the committees appropriating committees.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended one hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his time one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. I object.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. GOOD. I wanted to do it in behalf of men who wanted to speak in opposition. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that my time be extended 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this matter has been brought in here under a rule which might very well have provided what the gentleman now proposes, I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall try to condense what I have to say on this matter. I think this proposal is entirely impracticable and unworkable from the practical standpoint of legislation. I think it will lead to inefficiency instead of efficiency. I believe that it is absolutely impossible for any one committee, however able it may be, thoroughly and fully and completely to investigate all of the various appropriations from the multiplied angles that they are presented for consideration, and the result will be that the committee will be divided into a large number of subcommittees of 3, or maybe 5 members at the most. It would simply transfer the jurisdiction for the investigations and the examinations that are now being made by committees of 21 members, representatives of the country at large, seeing matters from different viewpoints, and concentrate it in the hands of 3 or 5 members, and they will conduct the investigations, and conduct them from their limited and circumscribed viewpoints. These committees that have been handling these appropriations during these years are familiar with the whole subject, and they investigate and report to the House.

Another thing that I wish to call attention to is that appropriations and legislation must be coordinated and must go together. Let me illustrate. Under this proposal the appropriation will be taken away from the Committee on Naval Affairs and be given to the Committee on Appropriations, but the legislation would remain with the Committee on Naval Affairs. The increase of the Navy, the providing of additional ships, the providing of additional guns, the providing of docks and improvements at yards, would have to be authorized by legislation before they could be appropriated for by this new committee. Under this proposed resolution the privileged status of all these committees is taken away. Suppose the Naval Committee reports a building program of ships, a program for docks, and other necessary improvements. It goes to the calendar. It has no privileged status, and the only way it could be called up would be when the call of the committee might come, perhaps once or twice in a session, or by getting a special rule. It is apparent that neither one nor the other plan is practicable or workable. But assume, for the sake of the argument, that you got your bill acted upon. It goes to the Senate. It has no privileged status there. But suppose that in the Senate it is enacted and becomes a law. In the meantime the appropriation bill has passed, and all of this matter would have to wait until the next session of Congress in order to have an appropriation made following the authorization; and the result will be, since these appropriations are effective only after the 1st of July for the ensuing fiscal year, they would not be available until after the 1st day of July, and you would have innumerable delays and inefficiency instead of efficiency. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

Mr. BUTLER. No; you can not do it. The Speaker has made the announcement.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GOOD. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 12.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 300 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, in 1789 the Ways and Means Committee was created, with authority to report revenue and appropriation bills. This jurisdiction of one committee over revenue and expenditures continued for 76 years.

In 1865 the Committee on Appropriations was created, with authority to report all appropriation bills, and this arrangement continued without interruption until 1880, when the Committee on Agriculture was created and given authority to report appropriation bills for the Department of Agriculture.

This plan continued for five years more, when jurisdiction was given to the Committee on Military Affairs to report appropriation bills for the military; jurisdiction was also given to the Committee on Naval Affairs to report appropriations for the Navy; jurisdiction was also given to the Committee on Indian Affairs to report appropriations for the Indians; and jurisdiction was likewise given to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report appropriations for the Post Office Department.

There was a lively fight in 1865 when jurisdiction was taken from the Committee on Appropriations to report appropriations for these various branches of the Government service, and when that jurisdiction was divided among these other committees.

We have now determined in this Congress, by a vote almost unanimous, only three persons having voted in the negative, to establish a budget system. We have determined to carry on the business affairs of the Government in a businesslike way. We have decided that the Chief Executive shall make a budget which shall be an estimate of the necessary sums to carry on the Government, and we have determined upon that policy because there is a growing demand throughout the country that we must practice real economy, that we must reduce the high cost of living; that to do that we must reduce taxation; and that to do that we must reduce expenditure; and to reduce expenditure we must have a budget system.

The Select Committee on the Budget, which have reported the resolution, went very carefully into the question as to how far we should go by legislation to amend the rules of the House. The committee, I think wisely, took the position that the law creating the budget ought not to attempt to bind future Congresses, the Constitution of the United States containing, as it does, the provision that each House shall prescribe the rules for its procedure.

Inasmuch as the Constitution guarantees to the next Congress that it shall prescribe its own rules to govern its procedure, it was thought unwise for this Congress to attempt to adopt rules for the next Congress by an act of Congress, and so we determined to take two steps, first, to bring out the budget bill creating the budget, and second, this resolution, which amends the rules of the House by providing a single committee on appropriations.

Congress has taken the first steps and passed the budget and accounting act. But, vain is a budget law, all in vain the legislation demanded by the American people for budgetary reform, if we only clean the executive departments and do not correct the evils existing in this House. [Applause.]

A great deal has been said to-day about the Committee on Appropriations seeking to extend its autocratic authority. I want to say for myself, and I think for other members of that committee, that if this resolution is adopted the House will be free and unfettered to select a committee of 35 Members for the Committee on Appropriations. My resignation as chairman of the committee and as a member of the committee will be at the disposal of the committee on committees. I feel that the question is so important that it so far transcends any individual ambition, and that we must, in order to make this budget law a workable law, sacrifice our personal ambition for the public good. [Applause.] I am perfectly willing to make the sacrifice, and shall gladly accept a demotion if that is thought desirable in order that this resolution shall be adopted.

If the resolution we have reported does not stand on its merits, if it does not have the real merit that it should have to secure your support, then do not vote for it; but I beg of you to-day to vote your intelligence, your convictions, and not your prejudice toward the committee or any member of any committee, and I realize that the committee is not popular, and when it becomes popular I for one shall question the quality of its work. Again, this resolution should not suffer because it gives additional power to a committee that must produce strict economy. If you want real economy, if you want a reduction in the high cost of living, a reduction in expenditures, a reduction in taxation, if you want a real budget, you will vote for this resolution.

I want to say a word to the Democratic side of the House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has wisely called your attention to the Democratic national platform of 1916, in which you said:

> We demand careful economy in all expenditures for the support of the Government, and to that end favor a return by the House of Representatives to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee chosen from its membership, in order that responsibility may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication in the public service as much as possible avoided.

Mr. Bryan, speaking in support of that platform, said:

> The Representative who secures office on a platform and then betrays the people who elected him is a criminal worse than he who embezzles money.

I do not say that; that is your platform and that is the measure of your responsibility upon that platform, as fixed by a man who was three times your candidate for the Presidency. You may do as you please, now that a real test has come, vote to repudiate your platform or vote to carry out its provisions. But I want to assure you that those Democrats who vote to repudiate their platform in this respect will, I believe, live to regret that action, and your deserts may come sooner than you think.

And I want to say to this side of the House that we are responsible for the legislation of the Congress. We are responsible now in this House for everything that goes through the House, and we are responsible for the things that we bring forward that fail of passage. Let us to-day assume that responsibility like true Americans, mindful of the fact that we have pledged ourselves in the last platform to a budget system. Let us remember that every man who appeared before the select committee on the budget said that a budget system was useless, that it was worse than folly to attempt it if we simply cleaned the executive household and refused to clean our own house.

An amendment will be offered in the way of a motion to recommit to provide that the Committee on Appropriations shall allot to these several committees the amounts they should appropriate and leave to those committees the determination of how much should be given to each object.

That proposition is like putting the roof on a house before you have laid the foundation or constructed the side walls. Just before we reported out the sundry civil bill the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] came to me and wanted to know what we were going to do with the appropriations. There was a billion and thirty-six million dollars of estimates. I told him there would be no appropriation for the Shipping Board, but that organization would be given authority to use balances. I want to say that no man in the House has a better knowledge of the sundry civil bill than the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. With that knowledge the gentleman gave to the press the fact that the sundry civil bill would be cut to $600,000,000. If I had been asked at that time to give an estimate, I could not have estimated much, if any, nearer, for the reason that while we had had hearings on 2,000 items or more estimated to be carried in the bill, it was not until after we had used the adding machines one night until 2 o'clock in the morning that we were gratified to learn that we had pared down the estimates of that bill to $428,000,000, or $200,000,000 less than the estimate of the gentleman from Wyoming. [Applause.]

If we had made the allotment as suggested before hearings, it would have been $600,000,000 instead of $428,000,000.

I say to you with all earnestness that it is altogether impracticable to try to fix the total of a bill until you have fixed the exact amount of every single item of the bill. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY], who has served so ably upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, I see nods his head time and again to what I have said on that proposition. He knows it is so, and every man working on an appropriation bill knows that it is so. It is folly to contend otherwise.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I regret that I can not in the little time I have.

We sometimes hear it said that this is a Government by political parties, and, in a sense, this is true. But in a stricter and more limited sense, Congress enacts its legislation through the committees of the House and the committees of the Senate. So far as legislation is concerned, therefore, ours is a Government by legislative committees. When in 1885 this House committed the folly of decentralizing the power of the Committee on Appropriations by giving to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads jurisdiction to report appropriation bills for their respective services, Mr. Blackburn, of Kentucky, gave the true philosophy of committee government and the real functions of legislative and appropriating committees. He said:

They (the committees) are appointed that they may guard the interests of the particular department committed to their care. That is the theory of the construction of the committees of the House; and it is a proper theory. The Committee on Appropriations stands in a very different attitude. Because of no special relation to any department, selected as a fair and impartial arbiter, with no more concern for the Navy or the Army than for the Interior Department or the Post Office Department, it has been selected as the one grand reservoir into which all these proposed disbursements of money should pour, in order that fairly, judiciously, impartially it may make its recommendations to the House.

Mr. Blackburn was opposed to the decentralization that took place at that time, and in the words I have quoted most forcefully pointed out the folly of intrusting to a legislative committee the power of making appropriations on matters in which he was vitally and deeply interested.

To prove that his philosophy was true and his judgment sound I desire to quote somewhat at length from the article written by Dr. Harlan Updegraft, of the Bureau of Education, that appeared in the American Schoolboard Journal for May, 1912. Dr. Updegraft was pleading for a further decentralization of the power of the Committee on Appropriations, to the extent that the Committee on Education should have jurisdiction to report all appropriation bills for educational purposes. Unwittingly he admits the soundness of the logic of Mr. Blackburn and the correctness of the position which the Committee on the Budget has taken in reporting out this resolution. He said:

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEDURE A HINDRANCE.

If during the past 40 years the Commissioner of Education had been granted lump-sum appropriations from which he could have paid salaries fairly commensurate with those paid by local public and private agencies throughout the United States, and had it been possible for him to set aside proper amounts for traveling expenses, the bureau would have made a far greater impress upon educational policy and practice. In consequence of the higher appreciation which would have resulted it is also quite probable that the Congress would have increased its appropriations from year to year until their magnitude would have become more nearly commensurate with the high regard in which all Americans hold their public schools.

However, there is an underlying cause for this situation in the business procedure of each of the two Houses of Congress. Under this procedure the estimates for some departments are acted upon by their friends at court, while the estimates for other departments are passed on by a tribunal whose main object is economy. All appropriation bills for the Department of Agriculture are prepared in the House Committee on Agriculture and are reviewed in the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. This same practice also holds with the appropriations for the Diplomatic Service, the military service, the naval service, and the Postal Service. On the other hand, the appropriations for the other branches of the executive departments are prepared by the Committee on Appropriations of the House and are referred in the Senate to its committee of like name. Quite naturally the attitude of these Committees on Appropriations toward the estimates submitted by their respective branches of the executive department is distinctly different from that shown by the committees which recommend the appropriations for a single department or bureau.

Members of the latter class of committees have their attention centered on one particular set of governmental activities, which they hold in growing appreciation as their knowledge of the work increases. On the other hand, members of the Committees on Appropriations have their attention divided among several departments and independent offices and commissions, all of which are more or less desirous of increased funds. Strong attachment to the work of any branch of the Government service is not fostered by such a condition. Moreover, the numerous insistent demands that come upon them develop a controlling idea in the minds of these Appropriations Committees—not the great good that may come to the people through any branch of the service, but rather the desirability of cutting appropriations to the lowest possible limit in order that the party in power will not be held accountable for large expenditures. In brief, all the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and the principal appropriations for the War, Navy, and Post Office Departments, are in the hands of their friends, while those of the remaining Government offices must come before a tribunal the chief aim of which is to keep the total appropriations, including those framed by the special committees, within certain fixed limits. It follows from this that the liberal appropriations recommended by the special committees have a tendency to lower the appropriations for the other departments, which are drawn directly by the Appropriations Committees. Had the estimates of the Commissioner of Education during the past 40 years been referred in the House to the Committee on Education and in the Senate to the Committee on Education and Labor there would undoubtedly be to-day a far different story to tell. If such a reform in the procedure of the Houses could be carried out to-day, an increased participation of the National Government in the educational development of the country would probably result.

It is, indeed, true that a legislative committee is appointed to guard the interests of a particular department committed to its care. That committee is appointed to defend that department and to assist in every worthy ambition for the growth and development of that department, even to the extent of taking up new projects that involve additional expenditures at a time when there should be rigid economy and a retrenchment in expenditures. This is not true of the Committee on Appropriations. It has no particular department to defend, no particular project to advance. It stands as the impartial arbiter of all the legislative committees, so far as appropriations are concerned, and at a time when retrenchment is necessary can say to each that it is necessary to retrench, and can lay down the rule by which the retrenchment shall be brought about. It applies to all committees alike. It is the grand reservoir to which all these departments must come and the appropriations for each will be measured by the necessities and national importance of the service appropriated for. At present there is a competition between these various committees that have this dual function to perform to see which department can grow the most rapidly, and nowhere does any one committee of the House exercise a controlling influence over the several committees that have appropriating jurisdiction.

In the report accompanying this bill I have quoted at length from the splendid speeches made by James A. Garfield, James A. Tawney, John J. Fitzgerald, and Swagar Sherley, all former chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations, and Hon. Thomas B. Reed, Samuel J. Randall, Warren J. Kiefer, and JOSEPH G. CANNON, all former Speakers of the House, and other eminent statesmen, to prove that real economy in appropriations and Government expenditure can not be effected unless all appropriation bills originate in a single committee. No one familiar with the working of Congress, and especially the committees of Congress, seriously questions this contention. It is the almost unanimous verdict of the men who have studied the problem and who have arrived at a conclusion unaffected by their position in the House or on a committee of the House.

Let us not attempt to deceive the American people on the question of budgetary legislation. Let us not attempt to deceive ourselves by the claim that by voting for the House bill, which provides for a budget system, we have done all that is necessary to do to bring about real economy through a budget system. That bill is a great step in advance. The bill which we have passed and which has gone to the President for his signature is the vehicle for the budget. The resolution which is pending before the House to-day is to put in the power that will make that vehicle move. By voting against this resolution you may deceive yourselves into believing that you have voted for all that is necessary in budgetary legislation, but you will not be able to deceive the voter in this regard.

It is said that the Committee on Appropriations would have great power. It has great power now, and always will have great power, and, in my opinion, its usefulness will be increased in proportion to the increased power granted it, assuming always, of course, the proper exercise of that power.

I do not have the time to explain this chart which is before you. It is, in a large measure, self-explanatory. It shows the present plan and not the proposed plan. The colored lines show the items appropriated through bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations. These from the bottom show the appropriations that go to the various departments and are carried in bills reported by the other committees. Here are the executive or spending departments. For example, take the Committee on Military Affairs. It reports two bills—one the Army bill and one the Military Academy bill; but the Committee on Appropriations reports out a bill carrying all of the clerk hire for employees in the War Department in the District of Columbia, and also reports the fortifications bill, which carries not only for works of fortification but also field artillery and ammunition for field artillery.

Mr. FIELDS rose.

Mr. GOOD. I can not yield. It also reports the sundry civil bill, which carries all of the appropriations for buildings and repair and maintenance of buildings at the Government arsenals. It reports all of the deficiency bills for the War and other departments. Stop and think of it and see how ridiculous and unbusinesslike this plan is. During the Sixty-fifth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress the Committee on Appropriations reported appropriation bills appropriating $13,313,000,000 to carry on the war, and during that same period the Committee on Military Affairs reported out bills carrying $11,000,000,000 for carrying on the war. A great part of the work, especially in time of war, must by the very nature of things be proposed in bills reported by the Committee on Appropriations, but the great trouble lies in this divided authority. One committee is working one way and another committee is working another way. The right hand does not know what the left hand doeth, and we find through all of our appropriation bills duplications in the service, we find waste and extravagance. We see great departments going to one committee for an appropriation, and if the funds are not granted they go to another, and not infrequently they succeed. How are you going to eliminate waste under this plan of divided authority? The resolution which we have offered is the solution. It creates one committee on appropriations of 35 members. That committee will be selected, not by the Committee on Appropriations but by the membership of this House. The Democratic Members determine their personnel, and we will determine our personnel.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 14 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 30 minutes additional time. This is an important matter, and we ought to understand it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that question has been debated several times, and those who would like to express themselves to the contrary on this resolution have had no opportunity. It seems to me it would be rather rubbing it in to have the time extended only to the affirmative side. I object.

Mr. GOOD. I will take one minute more. We are right up now to the proposition of determining whether we are going to make the budget law which we have enacted, which every man believes in, a real, workable thing, or whether we shall tear the budget, when it reaches us, into eight parts and send it to eight committees of this House and let them wrangle as they have wrangled before, duplicate expenditures as they have duplicated before, waste as they have wasted before. Shall we not rather adopt a plan of conducting the biggest business in all the world along business lines, unmindful of the ambitions of men? I plead in the interest of economy, I plead in the interest of the taxpayers, that you adopt this business plan. Let us finish the work we have started, and let the chips fall as they may. Take the committee assignments and go with them. I shall ask no man for my retention on the Committee on Appropriations. I want, if possible, to eliminate personalities from this consideration; to eliminate myself, if necessary. And I know the other members on the Committee on Appropriations would eliminate themselves, if necessary, in order that we might enact and carry into execution a piece of constructive legislation that will redound to the credit of this Congress and that will lighten the burdens of the taxpayers in the United States. [Applause.]

I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has referred to the declaration in the Democratic platform pledging the party to a budget system. I stand upon that platform; but it does not follow that the plan presented by the gentleman from Iowa is the only plan by which a budget system can be administered. There are evils in our present system, due to the fact that the Committee on Appropriations is exercising jurisdiction now that it should not exercise. If we want to cure the system, first vote down this proposition, which is not as good as the one under which we are now operating, and then let them consult with the other appropriating committees of the House and work out a budget system that will meet the requirements of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. No; I can not in five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I merely wanted to remind the gentleman of the words of the Democratic platform.

Mr. FIELDS. I am standing on the Democratic platform, and I shall not ask the gentleman from Wyoming to construe that platform for me. The gentleman from Iowa refers to the fact that during the war the Military Affairs Committee reported out bills carrying $11,000,000,000 for the support of the Army while the Committee on Appropriations reported out bills carrying $13,000,000,000 for the support of the Army. Let me tell you what happened: The War Department came to the Committee on Military Affairs with their estimates. We studied the propositions before us and allowed them what was necessary, and in many instances before one dollar of that money was expended they went before the Committee on Appropriations with a so-called deficiency and got additional funds there for the identical items for which we had appropriated.

With regard to the budget, I am for it; but the question is, Can a subcommittee of three, five, or seven members from the Committee on Appropriations better determine what the Military Establishment should have than 21 members as a military committee who have studied the legislation that makes the appropriations necessary? Can three, five, or seven members, constituting a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, better determine the needs of the Military Establishment than 21 members who devote their entire thought and energy to that proposition? If a subcommittee of five members of the Committee on Appropriations are more capable of passing upon the needs of the Military Establishment than are the 21 members of the Committee on Military Affairs, why have a military committee at all? The man who makes the contention must also contend that they are superior in mentality and business qualifications, and the man on the military committee or on any other committee who agrees with him admits by his agreement that that contention is well founded.

Now, if you want to correct this evil in regard to military appropriations to which the gentleman from Iowa has referred, vote down this proposition. Then come in with a budget system that will confine each appropriating committee within the limits prescribed by the budget committee and keep the hands of the Appropriations Committee out of all appropriations not properly under its jurisdiction. Let the Military Establishment go to the Military Committee for every dollar of their expenses, including deficiencies, and then there will be no room for duplication. Let the Navy Department go to the Naval Committee for its entire appropriation; the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for its entire appropriation; the Department of Agriculture to the Committee on Agriculture for its entire appropriations, including deficiencies. Confine each department to a specific committee for its entire appropriations. Have a budget committee cooperating with the Executive to determine the maximum amount that may be appropriated for each department and make it out of order for the committee having jurisdiction to exceed the maximum allowed by the budget committee for any department. By that method you will insure economy through the budget committee, prevent duplications by confining the appropriations of a given department to a single committee, and insure efficiency in the distribution of the amount appropriated among the various items of the bill by having it distributed by a committee that has an intimate knowledge of the department, acquired through legislative experience, which will enable it to know where reductions can be made and where they can not be made without impairing the service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. GOOD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, for several years there has been considerable talk among folks on the street about a budget. I hope the fact that I am on one of the big appropriating committees will not make me forget in the short time since I came here to vote for a budget. [Applause.] There is not a plainer or better understood fact in this Congress than the fact that the legislative committees should not appropriate and that the appropriation committees should not legislate. I have heard hundreds of men say that, but to-day a lot of you are going to forget it because you are on a big legislative committee that has authority now to appropriate money. I say it is beneath the dignity of a Congressman to forget his duty to his constituents simply because he is on one of these committees and to vote against our solemn pledge to the people of the United States in both platforms for the last 10 years. I shall vote for this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I have long been in favor of the adoption of a budget system because I realize that this Congress must do business in a businesslike way if we are to reduce expenditures, and that is what we want and that is what the people want. Being in favor of the adoption of a budget system I want to see it made effective, and we all know that it can not be made effective unless we change our rules. There are two plans suggested. One is the plan of the committee that vests in a budget committee of 35 Members acting through its subcommittees all appropriative authority. The other proposition is that we allow this budget committee to allocate the money and then permit the appropriating committees of the House to make up their appropriation bills. Now, there is, it seems to me, a fatal objection to this second plan. The fatal objection is that this money can not be allocated in an arbitrary way. It must be allocated in accordance with the national need. If it is to be allocated in accordance with national need the budget committee——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED (continuing). Will have to do all the work which is done by the separate appropriating committees of the House—I can not yield to the gentleman in the limited time—and we would thus have a duplication which economy forbids and which time will not allow. I sincerely hope that this Congress will do the patriotic thing, will do the thing that this country wants it to do, and that is to adopt this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to correct a mistake that was made in the numbering and also to add to the provision as suggested by the Rules Committee, so as to provide that when the Senate added an amendment which would be subject to a point of order if offered on the floor of the House, if that amendment was offered to a legislative bill and carried an appropriation, when it comes back the House should have a chance to vote. I ask for a reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, in line 15, strike out the figures "16" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "56."
On page 3, line 10, strike out the word "any" and insert in lieu thereof the word "no."
On page 3, line 13, after the word "House" insert "nor any amendment of the Senate providing an appropriation upon any bill other than a general appropriation bill."
In line 13, strike out the word "not."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment and resolution to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the amendment and resolution to final passage.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That will come later.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion to recommit offered by Mr. ANDERSON: I move to commit the resolution to the Select Committee on the Budget, with instructions to that committee to strike out all after the resolving clause down to and including line 8 on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"Rule X: By adding after clause 1a the following:
"'1b. There shall be a committee on the budget, to consist of the chairman and ranking member of the majority party and the ranking member of the minority party on the following committees: Appropriations, Ways and Means, Rivers and Harbors, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post Office and Post Roads, Indian Affairs, Public Buildings and Grounds, and the District of Columbia. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations shall be the chairman of the budget committee.
"'It shall be the duty of the budget committee to consider the budget transmitted by the President at the beginning of each regular session of Congress, and from time to time to determine the aggregate amount of appropriations which may be reported by any committee having authority to report appropriations under the rules. No committee shall report appropriations in excess of the total amount authorized by the budget committee for such committee for the ensuing fiscal year.'"
Strike out, on page 3, all of lines 17 to 25, inclusive.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not germane. It does a great deal in a different way than anything we have reported.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say in his opening remarks that there would not be this motion. The demand for the previous question has been made without any opportunity to understand it. Surely the gentleman will not take the House unawares and press the point of order at this time when he led us to believe that we would have a vote on it.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection to a motion to recommit that is germane and in order.

The SPEAKER. It occurs to the Chair at first blush that this resolution is a motion to amend the rules in many particulars.

Mr. GOOD. It is a motion to amend the rules in only those particulars that have to do with authority to report appropriation bills and increase the size of one committee, and under Rule XXII to provide that as to an amendment of the Senate that would not be in order if offered on the floor of the House, the conferees should bring back such amendment before agreeing to it. That is practically all that the resolution that we have offered does.

Mr. GARRETT. This creates a new committee.

Mr. GOOD. As I understood the reading of it, it creates a new committee altogether.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa seeks among other things to amend Rule X of the rules of the House. Now, Rule X of the rules of the House is a very comprehensive rule. It provides that "there shall be elected by the House at the commencement of each Congress the following standing committees," and then proceeds with enumeration of the committees of the House in detail, and Rule XI provides for the jurisdiction of these committees. It is true that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] does not create a new committee. It does, however, increase the membership of the Committee on Appropriations and does increase the jurisdiction of that committee. It is a very general amendment of Rules X and XI, and it seems to me it would be a very strict construction of the rules of the House which would hold that where you amend six or seven sections of a rule of the House you can not amend the same identical rule by another provision calculated to accomplish identically the same results.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield? Is it not also a fact that if you extend the jurisdiction of a committee you have to that extent created a new committee?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You have given it territory to occupy that another special committee might have occupied.

Mr. ANDERSON. Not only does this rule proposed by the gentleman from Iowa amend Rule X and Rule XI of the House, but it adds an additional section, Rule XX, which I preserve in the amendment which I offer. It seems to me that under the rules of the House under which it has generally been held that where a bill undertakes to amend one section or a number of sections of a law it is germane to offer to amend other sections of the law my amendment is clearly in order. If this resolution of the gentleman from Iowa were confined to Rule X, perhaps it might then be contended that it would not be germane to amend the rules in another particular, but the resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa goes far beyond that and proposes additional rules which have no relation to Rule X, and under that resolution, in my judgment, it is in order to amend any rule of the House. Surely it is in order to further amend the same rule amended by the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Minnesota contend that the rule relating to a motion to recommit operates upon a proposal to change the rules of the House, which is ordinarily done by the Committee on Rules, and if this rule was brought in by the Committee on Rules you could not recommit it to the Committee on Rules? Now, it is brought in by another committee, but it pertains to changing the rules of the House. Does the gentleman think you can recommit a proposition of that sort?

Mr. ANDERSON. I submit that this proposition as it now stands before the House stands exactly on the same footing as legislative proposals. This matter as here proposed is not privileged. The Committee on Rules, if it had reported this matter, would not have reported a privileged rule, and certainly it is not privileged when reported by the Committee on the Budget. If it had been it would not have been necessary to pass the rule which we passed to consider it. And the very reason which prohibits the motion to recommit on the rule reported by the Committee on Rules is based on the proposition that that committee has the right to report at any time and its reports are privileged.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, according to a precedent recently established, a report of the Committee on Rules changing the rules of the House has been held privileged under a rule which permits them to report at any time.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is true, I think, as to a rule providing for the order of business. I think it is not in order in reference to an amendment to a rule brought in in this way, which, I think, must stand exactly on the same footing as a legislative proposition. It is not privileged as coming from the Committee on the Budget; it has no privileged status in the House under the rules coming from that committee; it has no other status, no different status, than a legislative proposal, when reported by the Committee on the Budget or by any other committee, except the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the adoption of the rule which was reported by the Committee on Rules give it a privileged status, just the same as if it were reported by the Committee on Rules instead of by the Budget Committee?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not.

Mr. WALSH. Then what is the need of the rule?

Mr. ANDERSON. The resolution is given a privileged status by the rule, but does not otherwise have the privileged status of a rule or order of business reported by the Committee on Rules. It is not a privileged bill or a privileged rule under the general rules of the House. If it were, then clearly no rule would be necessary to provide for its consideration, because then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] could have risen in his place at any time and moved the adoption of this resolution. He did not do that. He did not do it because it was not a privileged resolution. On the contrary, he asked for a rule to make it in order, and to provide for its consideration, and by doing that it seems to me the gentleman from Iowa himself took the position that this resolution did not have the same privilege or the same standing before the House as a rule reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the question of whether a new rule has been made does not depend on the name, but on the substance of the rule. If we adopt a rule which takes away substantially all the powers from half a dozen or more of the great committees of the House and transfers them all to the Committee on Appropriations, if that does not make a new rule, I do not know how you would make one. It utterly changes the rules in that respect. It creates a new committee, with new powers, and it deprives other committees of powers they had before, and all in the most important particulars.

But, Mr. Speaker, that is not all. The question is can we amend this resolution? And what is the object and purpose of the resolution? It is to determine the manner in which appropriations shall be controlled. It is for the purpose of determining what committees shall set the limit upon appropriations. As this rule now provides, the Committee on Appropriations will fix the limit upon all appropriations. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] in his motion to recommit provides that the Budget Committee will set the limit on appropriations. Can anything be more germane or more material to the purpose and object of the resolution? I maintain clearly not, Mr. Speaker. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which we have under consideration, in so far as it seeks to amend Rule X, only amends it by increasing the size of the Committee on Appropriations from 21 members to 35 members.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the rule, in addition to what the gentleman has stated, also take away from the jurisdiction of the various committees now making appropriations the power which they now have?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is Rule XI. I am speaking now of Rule X.

Mr. ANDERSON. It takes it out of Rule X.

Mr. BARKLEY. Rule X in the rules of the House merely prescribes the number of committees that are to be elected by the House and prescribes the number of members on each committee.

Now, the resolution under consideration only changes Rule X by increasing the membership of the Committee on Appropriations from 21 members to 35 members. Therefore the motion by the gentleman from Minnesota to recommit, in which he seeks to amend Rule X by adding another committee, must be germane to Rule X or to the resolution amending Rule X, and the fact that this original resolution seeks to amend Rule XI and Rule XX and Rule XXII should have no bearing on the germaneness of the motion to recommit on the part of the resolution bearing on Rule X. Therefore it is my opinion, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as Rule X only applies to the number of committees, and the resolution under consideration only amends that rule as it applies to the Committee on Appropriations, it is not in order and it is not germane to the resolution as a whole to offer an amendment to Rule X which adds another committee to those already provided for in the existing rule; and the mere fact that subsequent provisions of this rule under consideration seek to take away jurisdiction from other committees and put that jurisdiction into the Committee on Appropriations that is created under Rule X does not make the motion in order to amend Rule X, which affects the provisions of the rule as it now exists. Therefore it seems to me very clear that this motion to recommit is not in order, as not being germane to the proposition contained in the resolution dealing with Rule X.

The SPEAKER. The original resolution amends the rules of the House in various ways, all applying to the one general subject. Now the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] offers his motion to recommit, and the objection is made that it is not germane. This proposition has been for years one of the alternative programs for establishing the budget system. It has been advocated as accomplishing the same result as the main resolution. It has been associated constantly with the subject and is substantially akin to it and is certainly in order unless it is technically not by precedents germane. The Chair would be disposed consequently to hold it in order unless very clearly it were out of order, inasmuch as it affords the House an opportunity to express its preference as to the different budget methods. The original resolution covers several rules, and the Chair thinks that the fact that this motion to recommit does authorize under Rule X a new committee does not make it out of order, because the Chair thinks it is germane to the whole resolution. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, 9 Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw the request.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York has withdrawn his request for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PADGETT) there were—ayes 79, noes 121.

Accordingly the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Do not make the point now.

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PADGETT. The yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 200, nays 117, answered "present" 1, not voting 109, as follows:

Mr. HOUGHTON with Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania.

On this vote:

Mr. LONGWORTH (for) with Mr. WINGO (against).

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts (for) with Mr. GOODALL (against).

Mr. WILLIAMS (for) with Mr. MCPHERSON (against).

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts (for) with Mr. HARDY of Texas (against).

Mr. MOORE of Ohio (for) with Mr. ROWAN (against).

Mr. KENDALL (for) with Mr. SULLIVAN (against).

Mr. SNYDER (for) with Mr. MCARTHUR (against).

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota (for) with Mr. HASTINGS (against).

Mr. SLEMP (for) with Mr. RANDALL of California (against).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. GOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, am I here in time to vote?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] informs me that he intends to call up the deficiency bill and begin general debate on that bill. It is not anticipated that there will be anything further than general debate this evening. I announced on yesterday that I expected to-day to ask for a recess from 6 until 8 o'clock, but it has occurred to me that in view of the fact that there will be no roll call this evening, no vote, it will be quite as well to continue the session and continue as long as gentlemen may desire and consider it profitable to address the House. Gentlemen are invited to remain to an evening of unrestrained and delightful oratory, and I trust that no one will be so ungracious as to make the point of no quorum during the procedure. If this is done we must adjourn, for I shall not call for a quorum. Just how long we will continue in session will be determined by events as they transpire, but in any event there will be no roll call.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. How long will the general debate last?

Mr. MONDELL. That can not be decided now, but if there is something of an attendance here and gentlemen desire to go on, we might be here as late as 10 o'clock. But there will be no vote, there will be no record made. So if gentlemen can not be here they can have no reasonable objection to the session continuing.

Mr. BLACKMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACKMON. Under what rule will we proceed this evening?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the rule of the House governing general debate.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, is it desired that the House shall first act on the gentleman's request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MONDELL. I made no unanimous-consent request; I made a statement of the business that will be taken up. Of course, it is for the House to determine how long it will continue this evening.

Mr. GARD. What is the purpose of the gentleman's request? What is the legislative program to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. There are a number of matters that will come up to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLACKMON. I want to know if this evening, under the the discussion, there will be any procedure that may be open for the people to nail the last tack in the State rights coffin?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman was asked what might be the business for to-morrow and he was interrupted and did not state. May I ask whether the gentleman is in a position to tell us what business will come up to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. That will depend upon whether a conference report is filed on the shipping bill to-night. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] informs me that he desires to take up a bill relative to the taking of the census on leather and hides. Matters that would have the right of way to-morrow are conference reports.

Mr. SISSON. I suppose we will go on with the deficiency bill?

Mr. MONDELL. We will finish the deficiency bill to-morrow.

Mr. SISSON. And there will be nothing but general debate on that to-night?

Mr. GOOD. We will have general debate to-night.

Mr. PELL. How long does the gentleman think the deficiency bill will take,

Mr. MONDELL. I could not tell.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know what the gentleman intends to bring up to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. The measure now before the House, the deficiency appropriation bill, has to be disposed of, and there are a number of conference reports that will have to be considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, what is the advantage in doing away with Calendar Wednesday when the whole calendar is subject to suspension of the rules? I object.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PELL. Reserving the right to object, how much does the deficiency appropriation bill carry?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know.

Mr. GOOD. About $52,000,000.

Mr. PELL. At the rate we worked the other day on the bonus bill, for a billion and a half, I should say the deficiency bill should occupy about 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Perhaps so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks in the RECORD upon the budget.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon war risk insurance legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a Memorial Day address delivered yesterday by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] at Arlington National Cemetery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD made yesterday concerning the agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LAYING CERTAIN BILLS ON THE TABLE.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to strike from the calendar the bill (H. R. 12721) to abolish the Subtreasuries and to provide for the transfer of the coins, currency, and bullion, and for other purposes, as an exactly similar bill has been passed as a part of the legislative appropriation act and signed by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to lay on the table the bill H. R. 13908, in respect to the farm-loan act, an identical Senate bill having been passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT—SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report for printing under the rule on the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14335) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be equally divided, to be controlled one half by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, in American history never has there been such scandal and incompetence as has been displayed by the present administration in relation to the sugar problem of the United States for 1920.

Never has there been an addition to the cost of living to the American people of a billion to a billion and a half dollars per annum, without excuse, without reason, and without apology, directly traceable to the gross neglect of any other administration.

Never have officials of the Government sought with such audacity and mendacity to mislead the American people by false and grossly misleading statements whose very utterance is their own refutation than in relation to the present price of sugar and its scarcity in the United States.

The Attorney General has twice stated that the President and he himself are not responsible for the increase of 100 to 150 per cent for 1920 in the cost of sugar at retail to the American people, that being an addition in the price of sugar per annum of a billion to a billion and a half dollars.

The first of these statements was made by the Attorney General April 29 before the committee investigating the Louisiana sugar action of the Attorney General. The second statement was made by the Attorney General to the public press shortly thereafter. These statements by the Attorney General are false and grossly misleading.

Sugar was sold during most of 1919 throughout the United States for 10 to 11 cents per pound at retail. This result was obtained through the action of the Sugar Equalization Board, a Government corporation, in purchasing the Cuban crop for 1919 with the assent of the President.

The Sugar Equalization Board is, has been, and can be in legal existence until 1923 under its charter. All laws in force in relation to the control of sugar in 1918 were in force through 1919, and are in force to-day and under them the same control over sugar could be exercised. This would be a short answer to the Attorney General's contention that Congress and not the President was responsible for the present sugar situation.

But assuming that some legislation was in fact necessary, it is obvious that Congress could in no wise be held responsible, if, as was the fact, the purchase of the 1920 crop was first a matter for presidential decision, and not only was that decision never made but Congress was never informed by the President of the facts involved.

The record has been made up and the record is very clear.

Mr. Herbert Hoover testified before the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives that as early as last July in Paris he had made a world survey of the food situation and had cabled to the President that there would be a sugar shortage in 1920 in the United States, with attendant speculation and profiteering, unless action was taken. The cable, as shown by the Sugar Equalization Board records, pressed for an immediate decision by the President as to the purchase of the 1920 Cuban crop and recommended a council with the members of the Sugar Equalization Board, stating that "determination of the sugar policies requires immediate consideration."

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I can not in my short time.

With this information in his possession, the President on August 8 addressed Congress in relation to the high cost of living, but made no mention whatever of sugar, although he did mention fresh eggs, frozen fowls, creamery butter, salted beef, canned corn, canned tomatoes, leather, coal, lumber, and textiles. In this message the President urged that the present food-control act should be extended both as to time and as to commodities to which it should apply, but not only was this recommendation made without any reference to the sugar situation, but as elaborated by him related to a wholly different subject.

It is the usual practice for the heads of departments to prepare and present to Congress bills to carry out recommendations of the President. Following this practice the Attorney General himself prepared and presented in August a bill to Congress amending the food-control act. In this bill there was no mention of sugar nor any provision for its control beyond 1919. In all of the hearings upon this bill at which the Attorney General appeared there was no mention made of the Cuban crop of 1920 nor any intimation that the food-control act should be extended so as to provide for its control. His later statement of November 7 to the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives that he had in August recommended the extension of the Lever Act is, as shown by the printed hearings, wholly false.

August 20, before the Agricultural Committee of the House, the Attorney General said:

> The draft which I sent to the committee makes only two changes in the food-control act, the first including wearing apparel and certain containers in the meaning of the word "necessaries," and the second was to put a penalty of $5,000 fine and two years' imprisonment upon all of the acts prohibited by section 4.

The Attorney General at all of these hearings opposed as impracticable the use or the extension of the licensing system for food control, which, as it afterwards appeared, was the one point insisted upon by the Sugar Equalization Board if the Cuban crop was to be purchased. This bill was passed by Congress substantially as drawn by the Attorney General.

In the meantime, on August 14, the Sugar Equalization Board privately sent to the President the Cuban Government's offer to sell the 1920 crop, accompanied by a detailed memorandum of the situation. This memorandum again called attention to the probability that the world sugar shortage for 1920 would be more acute than for 1919.

Even Prof. Taussig, who dissented as to the policy of buying the Cuban crop, concurred in the fact that indications pointed to a sugar shortage in 1920. These facts and these recommendations were never laid before Congress by the President. No answer whatever was vouchsafed even to the Sugar Equalization Board, except that the President had the matter under consideration. Thus not only was the Sugar Equalization Board prevented from taking any steps toward the acquisition of the 1920 Cuban crop but the American refiners were kept out of the market pending the decision, which was never made. Meanwhile, however, other countries began to contract for the coming crop, until by the latter part of September one-third of it had already been bought by foreign nations.

In all this matter the distinction between the then current 1919 crop and the prospective crop of 1920 must be kept in mind. The 1919 crop was under control, and while, as early as July, it was apparent that there were some difficulties in the sugar situation for that year, and there had been some resolutions introduced upon this subject, the situation was wholly independent of the prospect for 1920, which, so far as Congress had been informed, might indicate complete restoration of normal conditions. It was this situation for 1920 that remained in the keeping of those who had reported it as in duty bound to the President only to have it secreted and withheld from Congress.

On September 22 the Cuban offer was withdrawn, and the Sugar Equalization Board sent privately the following letter to the President:

SEPTEMBER 23, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The inclosed copy of a letter from Messrs. Hawley and Rionda, representing the sugar producers of Cuba, is self-explanatory, and in view of the fact that about one-third of the Cuban crop of next year has since been disposed of for export to countries other than the United States, we believe that the situation is out of hand.

Therefore, in order to protect the interests of the American consumer, we have advised American refiners as to conditions, so that they may purchase raw sugar as per prewar times.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE A. ZABRISKIE,
President United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.).

On September 27 Congress, on its own initiative, began an inquiry into the sugar question, and on October 3 the subcommittee of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate summoned the Sugar Equalization Board before it.

During the Senate hearings on that day for the first time the information was given to Congress that the Sugar Equalization Board had sent, in August and September, communications to the President concerning the coming shortage in sugar for 1920 and its recommendation that an offer of sale of the Cuban crop had been made by the Cuban Government, and finally that that offer had been withdrawn. All of these facts, with great reluctance, were testified to by the Sugar Equalization Board. Upon that same day the attorney for the Sugar Equalization Board was asked what legislation should be enacted, if any, and he replied, "I have not figured that out."

The legislation which, at the request of the Senate committee, he prepared the latter part of October as necessary was quite elaborate and very different from a simple extension of the Lever Act. Though isolated sentences may be wrenched from their context, the whole record shows that all concerned considered the President's decision to purchase the crop to be the first requisite step, and pending that decision, which was never made, even the Sugar Equalization Board itself had not considered the details of the legislation which it testified would be necessary to enable it adequately to control the distribution.

On October 30 the Attorney General first sent a communication to Congress that he desired an extension of the food-control act, and in his testimony on the bill he submitted on November 7 sugar or its control still was never mentioned. At this time it was absolutely impossible to purchase the Cuban crop; there was no offer pending from anyone in Cuba; the situation had been officially reported out of hand for over a month; the coming scarcity was manifest, and a large portion of the new crop had been purchased on private account. The opportunity had gone, never to return.

This shameful record places where it belongs the responsibility for the most unbridled extortion, unrestrained profiteering, and the wildest speculation in foodstuffs that has ever occurred upon the American continent. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The real explanation of the present sugar situation is too much League of Nations. It is the answer to the American consumers' sugar burden to-day. If the President had counted "America first" last July, August, and September, as he has since been compelled to do by the United States Senate, the sugar bill of the American people would have been less by hundreds of millions.

What, if anything, can still be done? This question was asked Mr. Hoover, whose recommendations of last July would, if followed, have averted the entire catastrophe. Mr. Hoover was of the opinion that two measures might even now greatly ameliorate the situation. The first of these as outlined to the House committee consisted of an international agreement regulating the purchase and distribution of sugar, thereby preventing the present excessive competition in neutral countries. The second was the rationing of nonessential manufacturers of sugar products. These suggestions were made on May 14. What will the President and the Attorney General do with these suggestions? The Attorney General will continue, as heretofore, with investigations and prosecutions which, however commendable, will have little effect whatever on the price of sugar. The President—I shall say no more. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent, I desire to incorporate in the RECORD as an extension the cablegram received from Mr. Hoover July 23, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to incorporate in his remarks the cablegram described by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The cablegram referred to is as follows:

PARIS, July 23, 1919.

Fruit 354 for Barnes, July 23. Please transmit the following to the President as a cable from me:

"It is necessary to take important decisions as to the sugar control in the United States in order to anticipate the marketing of a new beet harvest and to settle policy with Cuba for the next year. You will recollect that last July I presented to you the view that either in event of continued war and the consequent shipping isolation of the East Indies sugar, or in the event of peace and the opening of new demands, there would be a world shortage in the year nineteen. I recommended that we inform the Sugar Equalization Board to purchase the Cuban sugar crop jointly with the Allies and to arrange for equalization in marketing with the domestic sugar in order to assure American supplies at reasonable prices and to eliminate speculation and profiteering, and that the board should secure a small margin in handling Cuban sugar to cover losses in the event of reverse on Atlantic shipping and to equalize freight and distribution costs. These things were done, and to-day the United States is the only large Nation possessing liberal supplies for the entire year and at a saving of 4 cents per pound under the world price, or equal to about $25,000,000 per month saving to the consumer. These courses of action grew out of war disruption of supply and distribution. Decision must now be made as to whether Congress should be recommended to legislate authority for the continuation of these measures over the year 1920, providing again for the purchase of the Cuban crop and the control of domestic production, stabilization of price, and distribution. The intrinsic situation is by no means clear as to the prospect of supplies, and it is argued by many that there will be a continued shortage over the year 1920, with attendant speculation and profiteering, unless action is taken.

"The matters to be considered are (a) the crop prospects of the world, in which there is undoubtedly an increase over prewar in the Western Hemisphere and East Indies, but the European beet production (outside Russia) will be apparently 25 per cent short of prewar average, and although the Russian situation is unknown there are no exports likely; (b) the probable consumption of the world, as to which there is an undoubted increase in Europe, especially in the United States, but with regard to Europe the limited buying power during the next year (unless there is very rapid economic recovery) will tend to restrain the nonessential use of sugar.

"The problem is also affected by (a) whether European Governments will continue their national buying with national finance and be in position to contract for national supplies for long periods in advance to the prejudice of a free market and the ability of normal commerce to purchase on the same terms. This will probably depend upon whether the United States will allow credits to foreign countries to be used for such form of purchase; (b) whether in the long view the adjustment of production to world necessity will not be more rapid under free operation of supply and demand, although there may be great fluctuations in the process of readjustment; (c) whether, from a social point of view, it is desirable to perpetuate a great governmental control in commerce now that the war interference of supply through short shipping, the necessity of control of cargoes, etc., has largely disappeared, even though speculation and profiteering may result. Any continuation of control will require action by Congress, and it must embrace appropriations, the continuation of power and embargo, control of speculation, profiteering, and distribution. The alternative course to any action of the above character is for the Sugar Equalization Board to announce its cessation of control at an early date prior to the marketing season of domestic beet and cane sugars and to dispose of the remaining stocks from the old crop purchased by them at the market prices from day to day until they are exhausted. Owing to the delays in the Austrian treaty, it seems impossible for me to withdraw American control of railways, coal mines, and transport of food in central Europe before the middle of September, without producing absolute chaos in that area, and therefore I will not be able to arrive home before that date. The determination of the sugar policies requires immediate consideration, and my lack of intimate knowledge of American situation after eight months' absence, and my inability to leave here, renders it impossible for me to be of useful service in the matter. I therefore suggest you request Prof. Taussig, Mr. Zabriskie, and the other members of the Sugar Equalization Board to present you their recommendations in the matter independent of myself. If, as a result of your councils, you should decide to propose to Congress that the control be continued, it is imperative that a new chairman should be chosen in my place at once, in order that he may be of assistance to Congress in legislation, and that he should be in charge from the beginning, as I must, in any event, retire this autumn. If it be decided that there should be no extension of control, I would be glad to be relieved anyway, as I wish a rest, but if this should be inconvenient to you I would, of course, continue until the board is wound up this fall."

HOOVER.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields back five minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, on March 4, 1919, as a result of the preceding election in November, the control of both Houses of Congress passed to the Republican Party. In the last session of the preceding Congress a Republican filibuster in the Senate prevented the passage of the following annual supply bills: Sundry civil expenses, District of Columbia, the Army, the Navy, Agriculture, the Indian, and the deficiency appropriation bill pending at the time. The Republican Senators who conducted the filibuster during the closing days of that session frankly stated that it was their purpose to defeat a number of the supply bills so that the President would be compelled to call an extra session of the present, or Sixty-sixth, Congress early in the spring of 1919, in order to provide the necessary appropriations for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1919. They insisted that an early extra session was important because of the great need for the immediate consideration of reconstruction legislation which it was impossible to consider during the short session of the preceding Congress. Republican leaders of both branches of Congress solemnly assured the public that as soon as the new Republican Congress was assembled it would speedily get to work and pass necessary and important measures of relief.

Accordingly, on May 19, 1919, Congress was assembled in special session on the call of the President, and in a strong, earnest message he directed its attention not only to the necessity of the passage of the remaining supply bills before the following July 1, but to various other important measures which should be immediately passed in the interest of the country. He also gave notice that not later than January 1, 1920, he would direct the return of the railroads to their owners, and asked that necessary legislation be passed in order to enable him to do this. He urged "an early reconsideration of Federal taxes, in order to make our system of taxation more simple and easy of administration and the taxes themselves as little burdensome as they can be made and yet suffice to support the Government and meet all its obligations," calling particular attention to needed changes in the income and excess-profits tax to the end that there might be relief from certain inequalities and unequal burdens, existing on account of having been imposed during the stress and exigencies of war needs. He urged the enactment of a budget system, which has become vitally important on account of the enormous expenditures growing out of the war, and he and the Attorney General repeatedly requested Congress to pass certain amendments to the Lever Food Control Act, in order that profiteers might be proceeded against criminally and in aid of the efforts of the administration to reduce the high cost of living. The importance of these and other recommendations were strongly emphasized.

In what spirit did this Congress meet these wise recommendations of the President? Was it in a spirit of mutual service to the country? The record has been made and speaks for itself. From the very moment it convened in extraordinary session it began to play politics in the interest of the presidential election in 1920. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Instead of promptly devoting itself to the passing of wholesome laws it forthwith provided for a great number of investigating committees, which have spent their whole time in investigating Army expenditures during the war and every phase of its conduct. It is estimated that these investigations will cost the Government more than $1,000,000 for high-salaried employees, travel, and other expenses and the time of Government clerks and employees consumed in supplying data and information. And as a result these committees have discovered that an enormous amount of money was spent during the war, which everyone knew and approved at the time, and that the war was brought to a triumphant and successful conclusion earlier than was anticipated and with a minimum loss of life and expenditure, under a Democratic administration. Although Congress convened on May 19, it failed to pass the legislation necessary to enable the President to return the railroads on January 1, as he had announced, and on account of this delay he was compelled to postpone their return until March 1, 1920. Of this delay Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Leffingwell said in a recent address:

While Congress deliberated the Government held control of the railroad systems of the country for a year and a quarter after fighting stopped, and furnished transportation at less than cost. Then Congress ordered the railroads returned to their owners, with a new expenditure of $1,000,000,000 by the Government for their account and the deferment for years of $1,000,000,000 the railroads owe the Government.

It was not until a few days ago that the Senate passed the House bill which has for its object the establishment of a permanent shipping policy, which was also urged by the President in the interest of a permanent American merchant marine. In referring to this, and the expenditures of the United States Shipping Board, Mr. Leffingwell in the address referred to said:

The actual cash expenditures since armistice day amounted to approximately $1,600,000,000, while Congress deliberated as to our shipping policy. Notwithstanding the fact that it has been engaged in commercial shipping at a time when it is exceptionally profitable, the Shipping Board has made as yet no net return to the Treasury, its expenditures still exceeding its receipts.

It was more than four months before an amendment to the Lever Food Control Act was adopted, and only after repeated requests from the Attorney General. Congress has given no consideration to a revision of Federal taxes. It was nearly six months before the House passed the act creating the budget system, and another six months elapsed before the Senate passed it with amendments, and it is only now in process of finally becoming law. Estimates for the ensuing fiscal year must be prepared in September and October, and it is now too late for an organization to be fully perfected under this law and to obtain the greatest measure of benefit from it in so far as the appropriations for the next fiscal year are concerned, inasmuch as these appropriations must be made at the short session, which ends on March 4 next. It is impossible to estimate the loss which will accrue to the Treasury on account of this delay, but it will amount to many millions of dollars if the claims which are made by its advocates of savings as a result of the budget system are true. The Congress has failed to repeal any of the war-time legislation, much of which has become burdensome and oppressive to the people, since the war has come to an end.

What has been the record of this Congress as to retrenchment in expenditures? As I have said, it was necessary at the extra session to make appropriations for sundry civil expenses, Agriculture, the Army, the Navy, the District of Columbia, and the Indian. All of these bills had been passed by a Democratic House at the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, but had failed of passage in the Senate on account of the filibuster referred to. At the extra session the appropriations for the Army and the Navy and the Shipping Board were greatly reduced from what they were when they passed the House, due solely to the fact that in the interim, as a result of Democratic efficiency, the Army and Navy had been more speedily demobilized than it was originally thought could be done, and on account of the reduction in the shipbuilding program and the beginning of the process of liquidation. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP], in his remarks which appear in the RECORD of May 31, claims credit for a reduction of $940,000,000 of the estimates submitted for these appropriations, but he fails to state that these reductions appear entirely in the estimates for the Army, the Navy, and the United States Shipping Board. The facts are that at the time the Army bill passed the House in the last session of the Sixty-fifth Congress there were a million and a half men in the Army in France and a half million or more men here. These men had to be brought back to this country and then demobilized, and everyone, both Republicans and Democrats, in committee and in the House concluded that by as rapid a demobilization as then seemed possible the Army would average during the ensuing fiscal year 500,000 men.

But four months later, when the new Army bill was passed, Congress found that owing to the diligent and efficient administration by the War Department and the Navy Department in bringing back the boys from Europe and demobilizing the Army so much more rapidly than was anticipated at the preceding session, the average Army, instead of being 500,000 for the ensuing fiscal year, would be only 300,000, and hence the amount of the appropriation was reduced to provide for this size of an Army instead of the 500,000 men as it appeared to the committee and House was necessary in the preceding session. That was the cause of the difference in the appropriation figures, and Mr. KAHN, the Republican chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, stated on the floor that the work of demobilization had progressed faster than was anticipated by the War Department, and that—

> The committee was justified at that time in appropriating for that number because it seemed to the committee that it would not be possible to demobilize our forces as rapidly as they have been demobilized.

This is a splendid tribute from a high Republican source to Democratic efficiency. The same is true of the reductions made in the estimates for the Navy. Mr. BUTLER, the Republican chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, stated that these reductions were caused by "conditions, plans, or events occurring subsequent to the adjournment of Congress." These reductions were made possible solely by reason of Democratic efficiency in demobilizing the Navy more rapidly than had been anticipated at the preceding session, and deferring certain construction until a later appropriation bill. And yet in the face of this record the gentleman from Virginia claims that the Republican House reduced these particular estimates in the sum of $940,000,000 and fails to give credit to the War and Navy Departments, who alone made it possible. The Republican members of these two committees will not sustain him in that contention.

Leaving out, therefore, the appropriations made for these three purposes it will be found that the appropriations made in the bills referred to exceeded by more than $62,000,000 the amount previously appropriated by a Democratic House for the same fiscal year and for the same purpose. That is a part of what the Republican filibuster in the Senate and this Republican Congress cost the Treasury in the first six weeks of its first or extraordinary session. In view of this record is it any wonder that the Republican majority leader in his numerous statements on the floor and in the press carefully refrained from referring to the record of retrenchment made by this Congress at the extra session? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It should be stated, Mr. Chairman, that in addition to the appropriations previously made for the fiscal year, there has been passed at this session of Congress a railroad deficiency bill carrying the sum of $309,717,285.79, representing only in part the loss accruing to the Government in the operation and control of the railroads during the war, and also three deficiency bills carrying appropriations aggregating the sum of about $176,771,889. The third deficiency bill also carries for the next fiscal year in appropriations and authority to settle certain claims the amount of $80,271,810.63. This additional sum was in very large part made necessary by obligations growing out of the war, and I have referred to it for the purpose of showing the great demand which has been made on the Treasury during this fiscal year, and to emphasize the importance of the most rigid economy in future appropriations.

Excessive expenditures by the Government means necessarily high taxes, and it must be remembered that these taxes are not only passed on to the consumer in the price of what he has to buy, but that they are multiplied many times in the process. Governmental extravagance is one of the great factors which contributes to the high cost of living by reason of the high taxes imposed, and it is highly pertinent to inquire as to just what this Congress has done toward reducing the expenditures of the next fiscal year, bearing in mind that the true test of economy is not a mere reduction of such estimates as may be submitted by the department, but that it must be determined by a comparison of the appropriations made with those heretofore made for like purposes and under similar conditions, and also whether or not Congress has refrained from creating new activities and imposing new obligations for which there was no pressing and immediate necessity. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The total appropriations carried in the 13 supply bills for the next fiscal year amount to $2,212,126,298.78. This is exclusive of the permanent appropriations amounting to $1,363,768,980.29 and also of the amounts carried in special acts passed at this and the previous session to which I shall refer hereafter. Neither does it include the amount necessary to provide for the bonus which has been provided for employees whose salaries are less than $2,500, and which it is estimated will amount to something like $35,000,000. The appropriations carried in the annual or regular supply bills are $1,384,917,650.39 less than the estimates which were originally submitted by the various departments.

However, it should be said just here, Mr. Chairman, that some of these estimates were voluntarily withdrawn and for which credit should be given in the reductions above referred to, but to which neither the majority leader nor the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations have referred in the statements which they have made. For instance, there was withdrawn by the departments from the estimates for the sundry civil bill sums amounting to more than $225,000,000. Eighty-five million dollars was withdrawn from the naval estimates and $51,000,000 from the estimates for fortifications, and there were similar withdrawals from estimates considered in other appropriation bills, but in less amounts.

The reductions made are principally in the estimates submitted for the Army, the Navy, and the United States Shipping Board. Congress has the authority and must establish the policy as to the size of the Army and Navy to be maintained, and the reduction in the Army estimates is due to fewer men and correspondingly less supplies than was originally estimated for. The reorganization bill which has just been adopted provides for an Army to be maintained in peace time of a maximum strength of 300,000 men and 18,000 officers, and which if enlisted to full strength will cost the Government $650,000,000 annually to maintain in times of peace. The Army appropriations for the next fiscal year provide for 175,000 men and 17,000 officers, resulting in the reduction of the estimates in the sum of $590,563,755. Just why this appropriation was increased to make provision for over 90 per cent of the maximum officer personnel, when provision is made for less than 60 per cent of the maximum enlisted personnel, has not been explained. The appropriation for the Navy is $433,279,574, which is a reduction of $149,351,680.80 in the estimates, but this reduction has also been brought about entirely by fewer men, fewer ships, and a liberal draft on unexpended balances and reserve supplies.

There is also a reduction in the estimates for the emergency ship fund of $446,270,652, which was voluntarily reduced by the Shipping Board to $261,000,000 on account of developments subsequent to the time when the original estimates were submitted. This great reduction was made on paper by making no direct appropriation for this purpose but reappropriating the unexpended balance on hand and authorizing the Shipping Board to draw on its receipts for sales of ships, surplus material, operations, and so forth, to an amount of at least $225,000,000 in the aggregate.

Too much can not be said, Mr. Chairman, in condemnation of such a policy. It misleads the public as to just how much money has been appropriated for governmental needs, inasmuch as these sums do not appear as a part of the sum total appropriated in the statements which have been made. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Good business and sound economical administration and policy requires that all receipts for Government operations shall be covered into the Treasury and direct appropriations made, in order that there may be no uncertainty as to just what amounts have been made available for Government expenditures. There has been reappropriated large unexpended balances which do not appear in the stated sum totals of appropriations, but which nevertheless constitute a direct charge on the Treasury for the next fiscal year.

It is impossible at this time to accurately determine the exact amount of these reappropriations, but it can be safely said that they will amount to more than $350,000,000, and the very fact that one can not pick up an appropriation bill and quickly ascertain the full amount of appropriations carried is a strong and compelling argument against this method of making appropriations. It has, however, no doubt served its purpose in that it has made possible an apparent reduction of the estimates in these sums and thus enable gentlemen on the other side to boast of a reduction which appears on the surface but which in reality does not exist. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the reductions made in the estimates for the Army, the Navy, and the Shipping Board are excluded, and the amount of reappropriations and expenditures authorized out of governmental receipts are taken into consideration, it will be observed that there have been very slight, if any, actual reductions made in the sum total of the estimates.

Gentlemen on the majority side of the Chamber have referred to these reductions as savings and as showing great economy on the part of Congress. With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, to those gentlemen who have made this claim, such an insistence is nothing short of ridiculous. It is sheer nonsense. If that is to be the rule by which the economy and the saving of a Congress is to be determined let me call their attention to the fact that for the fiscal year 1918 a Democratic Congress reduced the estimates in the sum of $5,554,161,598.31, and that during the eight years while the Democrats were in the majority on the Appropriations Committee estimates for the bills over which it had jurisdiction were reduced in the sum of $9,275,684,891.55. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the facts are that Congress invariably reduces the estimates submitted by the departments. The record during all previous administrations demonstrates this fact, and no one heretofore has ever claimed that such reductions of themselves constituted an evidence of economy on the part of Congress. A comparison of the estimates submitted with the appropriations made in order to establish a record for retrenchment is clearly a false basis of computation and comparison, for real legislative economy or retrenchment consists in cutting down the amount of fixed or normal expenditures as made during previous years. The only correct way by which to determine whether a Congress has practiced economy and retrenched expenditures is to compare its appropriations with those made by preceding Congresses for similar services to be performed under like conditions. When judged by this standard the present Congress has not reduced but has actually increased expenses. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is entirely proper to compare the appropriations made for the fiscal year 1921, two years after the signing of the armistice, with appropriations made for the fiscal year 1916, the last full fiscal year preceding the war. I will append a comparative statement showing the amounts carried in the various appropriation bills for these two fiscal years. It will be observed that these bills carry appropriations for 1921 amounting to $2,212,126,298.78, while the same bills for the fiscal year 1916 carry $978,722,857.78. In addition there was carried permanent and miscellaneous appropriations for each year, making the total sum appropriated for the year 1921, $4,859,690,327.30, as compared with $1,114,937,012.02 for 1916, or an increase of $3,744,753,315.28. It is true that there are certain large obligations and activities growing out of the war and which may be called war hang overs which have to be taken care of during the next fiscal year, and for which there were, of course, no appropriations made in 1916, but these additional obligations and activities are principally provided for in the Army, Navy, and sundry civil bills, and also in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which carries appropriations, among other things, for the pay of Government employees in the District of Columbia.

That bill carries for 1921, $104,735,726.11, as compared with $36,904,799.75 for the year 1916. I submit that these figures do not indicate any very great tendency toward reducing the number of employees necessary during the war and returning to a normal basis. If you deduct from the appropriations in the sundry civil bill for 1921 the amounts carried for compensation, hospital treatment, and training of soldiers and other services growing out of the war it will be found that it carries $154,866,881.92, as compared with $126,922,750.79 which was carried in 1916 for the same purpose. An analysis of the appropriations made in the other bills which can not be said to have any connection with obligations arising out of the war and which appear in the table which will be appended shows that there have been like increases made in those bills for these strictly prewar activities. Thus it will be noted that there was appropriated for pensions for military service rendered prior to the World War the sum of $279,150,000 for 1921, as compared with $164,100,000 for 1916; for the Postal Service, $462,575,190 for 1921, as compared with $313,364,667 for 1916; for the Indian Service, $10,040,655.27 for 1921, as compared with $9,771,902.76 for 1916; for Agriculture, $31,712,784 for 1921, as compared with $22,971,782 for 1916; for the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $9,218,537.91 for 1921, as compared with $4,061,280.01 for 1916; for fortifications, $18,833,442 for 1921, as compared with $6,060,216.90 for 1916; for the Military Academy, $2,142,212.70 for 1921, as compared with $1,069,813.37 for 1916; and for District of Columbia, $18,373,004.87 for 1921, as compared with $11,859,584.45 for 1916, an increase of $326,730,701.49 for 1921 over the amount appropriated in 1916 in these nine regular appropriation bills, or more than one-third of the total amount appropriated in the 13 regular annual supply bills for 1916.

And let me say again that it can not be claimed that these increases have been brought about as the result of activities growing out of the war, or "war hang overs." And this does not take into consideration the increased drafts on the Treasury made by special acts passed at this and the extra session, and to which I will refer hereafter. The record clearly refutes the claim that this Congress has reduced and retrenched expenditures or that it has given consideration to the condition of the Treasury and the burdens of an already heavily taxed people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In addition, Mr. Chairman, this Congress has enacted a great number of laws carrying appropriations in varying amounts and which were not asked for by the administration and do not appear either in the estimates or the amounts carried in the various appropriation bills. It is not my purpose in the time allowed me to discuss the wisdom of these measures, nor can I refer to them all specifically. Perhaps the greater number of them are highly deserving measures; but desirable as some of them may be, it may be said that a number of them could and should have been postponed until the people have been relieved of at least a portion of the burdens under which they are now staggering. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A law has been passed providing for industrial rehabilitation and imposing during the future years an annual charge upon the Treasury of $75,000 for administration expenses and $1,000,000 to be used in cooperation with the States. Everyone knows that this is just a starter, and that this sum must be increased to many millions of dollars each year if all of our industrial cripples are to be given like treatment.

There is a matter of sentiment about such a law which must and does appeal very strongly to everyone, but such a law was never proposed in the years that have passed when our revenue was plentiful, and, to say the least, it is significant that it should have been passed at this session, under present revenue conditions, but in time to continue and perpetuate the existence of the Vocational Board and its large administrative force, which was created primarily and solely to train the gallant soldiers and sailors and marines of the late war who have disabilities growing out of their service, and for whom a grateful Government and people are willing to provide every dollar necessary for their comfort and future happiness and prosperity. The people are now being taxed to a degree never before dreamed of to meet the enormous expenses of the Government, and to take care of interest charges and obligations growing out of the war, and in addition thereto we are told that $8,000,000,000 will have to be raised in the next three years to meet outstanding obligations which will fall due. Why, therefore, was not this service left to the industries or to the States for at least a few years longer? It was in this spirit and with this idea that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GOOD], who, it must be said, has endeavored to bring about real economy, remarked in the course of the debate on the bill:

> We are going to talk about economy, but no man—I care not which side of the aisle he sits on—can in the next election say anything about economy or criticize the lack of economy if he votes for a bill of this kind, which absolutely requires annual appropriations.

This is a severe indictment by one of the Republican leaders of the chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, who proposed and fathered the bill, and of the Republican majority leader, who championed it on the floor of the House, and of the chairman of the Republican national committee, who, it was charged by a prominent and veteran Republican Member and leader, intervened in favor of its passage—presumably for political purposes—and of the Republican majority in this Congress, which placed the law upon the statute books.

Laws have been passed increasing the pension of those who were in the military service prior to the late war. These laws will add at least $77,500,000 to the present pension appropriation, and as a result there has been appropriated for the next fiscal year the sum of $279,150,000, which is nearly $56,000,000 more than has ever been paid in any one year and $123,714,708.97 more than was paid eight years ago. Lest I be misunderstood, let me say, as one coming from the South, that I do not begrudge one dollar that is necessary to provide for the dependent Civil War veterans. [Applause.] The Union which he fought so bravely to preserve owes him that; but I do insist that particularly at this time there should not have been included those who have comfortable and, in many cases, large private fortunes and incomes, nor those who years ago left our country and who during all these years have lived in foreign lands, holding allegiance to other flags, but who are now drawing pensions from our Government. It would have been far better and more in keeping with the debt which the Government owes to the dependent Union soldier to have applied the increased sums which will be paid to these two classes to still further increase the pension of the brave Civil War veteran who in the evening of his life finds himself dependent upon his pension for a living.

The railroad transportation act recently passed carries an appropriation of $200,000,000 to wind up claims and $300,000,000 as a revolving fund for loans to railroads. While these sums will eventually be returned, nevertheless they constitute a present charge on the Treasury and are not included in the regular appropriation bills. This act also provides for an indefinite appropriation to take care of the six months' guaranty of income to the railroads, which it is stated will amount to at least $200,000,000, and an indefinite appropriation for the short-line railroads, which it is estimated will amount to $25,000,000. These sums do not appear in the act creating this liability of the Government, but they nevertheless constitute a direct charge upon the Treasury. In addition, this act increases the membership of the Interstate Commerce Commission from 9 to 11 and raises their salaries from $10,000 to $12,000 and the salary of the secretary from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum. It also provides for nine members of a labor board, at a salary of $10,000 each, and $50,000 for expenses.

A number of other laws have been passed carrying appropriations to which I have not the time to refer. It may be said, however, that they add many millions of dollars to the annual expenses of the Government which were not included in any request of estimate submitted by the administration.

It should be stated that none of the appropriation bills carry the appropriations necessary to cover the increased pay of officers in the Navy, the Coast Guard, and the Public Health Service and which were authorized at this session. These increases will amount to $25,000,000, and will have to be provided for in a deficiency bill at the December session. The same is true of the additional sum required for the increase of the pensions of Spanish-American War soldiers under an act recently passed, and which it is stated will amount to $12,500,000. This is in line with the policy of this Congress to defer appropriations for undisputed obligations of the Government and to provide for them in deficiency bills for the plain purpose of bolstering up a spurious claim for economy. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It will be observed that despite assurances of the most rigid economy this Congress has imposed financial obligations and charges on the Treasury for the next fiscal year amounting to more than $4,800,000,000. This is a startling fact when it is remembered that these appropriations are made for a period two years after the signing of the armistice, and when we should at least be approaching prewar conditions in governmental expenditures.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] in the remarks referred to states that the total of the obligations imposed upon the Treasury by this Congress for the next fiscal year amounts to $4,094,100,897. An examination of the figures submitted by him clearly shows the error of his statement. For instance, he states that the total amount of the appropriations carried in the annual appropriation measures is $1,753,340,897, whereas the facts are that these appropriations amount to $2,212,126,298.78. In addition to this he has failed to take into account more than $350,000,000 which is carried in reappropriations for the next fiscal year and which are as much a part of the charges upon the Treasury as the direct appropriations made. In addition to this he has totally failed to even refer to the millions of dollars which have been appropriated in special acts at this session and the preceding session of Congress. It will thus be seen that, taking Mr. SLEMP's figures and adding thereto these items which he has omitted, the total charges upon the Treasury for the next fiscal year will amount to more than $4,800,000,000. Mr. SLEMP is one of the ablest Members in Congress, and, of course, knew better, and his failure to include these very large sums as a part of the sum total of appropriations for the next fiscal year is an evidence of what is in his mind and in the minds of the Republican leaders as to what will be said by the American people when they learn that this Congress has placed upon their shoulders such a staggering burden of expenditures for the next fiscal year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such, in part, is the record made by this Congress. A lamentable record of broken promises, false claims of economy, and failure of performance. This Congress can truly make the confession, "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done." It is not strange that there is criticism throughout the country on account of its failure to retrench, as was so often promised by its leaders, and that the Washington Post, a paper of well-known Republican sympathies and strongly antiadministration in its policy, should have said in an editorial published on Saturday, May 15:

> Do the Republicans of Congress suppose that the people approve of the record made since March 4, 1919? Why are not the taxes reduced? Or, if there must be heavy taxes, why have not the Republicans readjusted the burden according to the tested Republican tax policy, which seeks to protect both American industry and American labor, instead of sweating it for purposes of governmental extravagance? * * * The chief offender against economy and cheaper living is the Government, and the Republicans are responsible for the failure to retrench. They have only a little time left in which to make good.

And yet in a few short days we are to abandon the work of this session with this duty and service unperformed. In conclusion, let me say to my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle, that when the record of this Congress is laid before the American people, and when it has been fully examined and understood by them, they will at the November election write for you what was written by the specter hand for Belshazzar, the Babylonian king, high on the wall of his magnificent and costly palace, built and maintained by an overburdened people, "Mene mene, tekel, upharsin," "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave at this time to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall finish the remarks I have prepared within the 15 minutes allotted me.

"LEST WE FORGET."

The Sixty-sixth Congress, elected in November, 1918, would, under the law, have met December 1, 1919; however, by reason of the failure of the Sixty-fifth Congress to pass the greater part of the supply bills for 1920, the President convened the Congress May 19, 1919, with only the time from then until July 1 to complete the work left over from the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Now, the Sixty-fifth Congress had the experience of meeting in December, 1918, after the election, and after the signing of the armistice which ended the war, and after a lot of the Members had been defeated for reelection. Many of these Members did not work at all; some very little; and the work in the committees progressed very slowly. So while the House passed all of the regular supply bills, it did not do so until just at the end of the Congress; that left the Senate only the choice of taking the bills as they came to them or letting them fail of passage through that body. The Senate allowed most of them to fail, as there was no time to properly consider them. Thus, it is easy to see that the Sixty-sixth Congress has had two years of regular routine work to do in one year.

The Sixty-fifth Congress was Democratic; the Sixty-sixth Republican, so far as the House is concerned; the Senate being practically a tie. The Democrats criticized the Republican Members of the Senate for the failure of the supply bills in the spring of 1919, and called that failure a filibuster. It was not a party filibuster; however, some Senators did filibuster at the end, claiming there was no time to consider these important bills. We have heard nothing of this filibuster for more than a year now. Why? I will tell you. The Congress convening May 19, 1919, passed these supply bills before July 1, reducing them in amount more than $1,000,000,000. It was not intended that we should be called together in time to do anything but pass the bills just as the departments wanted them, but every Member of the new Congress came here in February, 1919, got his committee assignment, got copies of the supply bills and went to work. So, when we were called here on the 19th of May we knew something of the work ahead.

The members of the important committees worked day and night for those first few weeks. I want to say to you that it looked to a new Member as if law-making was the hardest work in the world.

I had been insistent on getting a place on one of the large committees, and had told the leaders in the House that I wanted to work. They took me at my word and I am proud to be able to state that I have helped shape some of the legislation passed by this House. To be able to have these bills passed by July 1 and have them carry a billion dollars less than the ones passed by the old Congress was worth while. That is the reason why you have not lately heard, and will never again hear, much about that filibuster of 1919.

Now, remember this, we have only claimed credit for saving a billion dollars over the old bills when, as a matter of fact, as we passed the bills, the saving was one and one-half billion. The reason I say one billion is that the departments have made us appropriate one-half billion since; so that the real saving on the first year was only a little over one billion. You ask how can the departments make Congress appropriate money, and I want to explain that. Let us take two examples: One in the Department of Agriculture and one in the Department of the Treasury. First, say we give the Bureau of Animal Industry one and one-half million dollars to fight tuberculosis in cattle; providing one-half million for administration and one million to be used to pay for cattle destroyed. That looks as if Congress had guarded that appropriation fairly well. Now, under the law any man in any department can be punished for creating a deficiency. So they will not create any, but here is what they will do: They will hire enough men to spend this one-half million dollars in eight months. Then, at the end of seven months they will serve notice that all work in that department will stop at the end of the eighth month unless Congress gives them additional money. Now, this is an important work; if you stop it you lose the money already spent; the people want the disease wiped out in that portion of the country where the population is congested, and it is necessary to keep the milk cows up all the year round, as we call it in the West. It is important to human life that this work be continued; and Congress is practically forced to give this executive officer of the department more money. We can not even remove him for abuse of discretion. He has his office by appointment of the President, who was elected by the people; and no matter how strong a Member of Congress may believe he has absolutely wasted one-half of this money, no matter how strong he may believe that he has three men doing one man's work, he will have to acquiesce in the deficiency appropriation. We can not waste all that former Congresses have spent in the work, so his demands must be met; all we do is to pare them down as low as we can and go ahead.

Second, say Congress gives the Bureau of War Risk Insurance only enough money to keep 7,500 clerks employed. They come before the committee and agree to do the work with about that number. The appropriation is made for only that number. The law is that they can not create a deficiency; but they are not in sympathy with Congress, and while probably not over 5,000 of them actually work, they keep 10,000 on the pay roll, and claim they all work. Then at the end of seven months, the executive officer in charge goes to the Appropriations Committee and says: We will have to close the bureau on the first of next month if you don't give us more money. Now, no matter how much you may know concerning the fact that they are not trying to help, but are, on the other hand, trying to show that you can't save, Congress can not let them shut down. Let me call your attention to this, the department heads never pick an unimportant thing to shut down. So I say, in a way, the executive departments of the Government can force the legislative branch to some extent. I am sure it is best to have both branches of Government, but right now I am just as sure that it is unfortunate, indeed, that the executive branch is not in sympathy with the legislative in matters of economy as well as policy. Take the veto of the President on the administrative bill that provided that the Joint Committee of the House and Senate should decide about Government publications; the President says we are encroaching on the executive powers; we could not pass that over his veto, as the vote was nearly a straight party vote. That veto simply said to Congress you have got to let my departments waste more than a million dollars; if you don't we will cut out the necessary printing and blame you for it. In my judgment he made a sad mistake in this; nearly every one is now familiar with the printing waste in his departments. So I say we are extremely fortunate in keeping them down $1,000,000,000.

Now, while I am talking of the appropriations, let me discuss the appropriations for the year 1921, which we have just passed. These bills carry about one and one-half billion dollars less than demanded by the departments; and they carry sufficient to run the Government in such times as these. However, let me call your attention to the statement of the chairman of the Democratic national committee, in which he says we can not save that amount "as there will be deficiencies." He surely doesn't mean that, as that would be criminal, and carry some of them to jail.

Now, the heads of the several departments have agreed to get along with these appropriations. Of course I was suspicious they would not try it, even before the national chairman spoke, but for him as the selected leader of his party to openly boast that they are not going to get along, but will force more, seems to me to be audacious, to say the least.

This Congress has tried to get the country back to normal. Let me show you how this year's appropriations are made up. They total $3,500,000,000, of which $1,000,000,000 is to pay interest on the national debt caused by the war; $278,000,000 is for a sinking fund to retire the national debt, as provided for by law when the same was created; $450,000,000 of it is to pay obligations such as war-risk insurance and obligations to soldiers occasioned by the war. Congress has no choice in these matters; they must be paid. Now, on the running expenses of the Government we have $1,772,000,000. If you deduct from this the finishing of some ships and the payment for some lands and hospitals occasioned by the war you have a prewar basis.

So far I have only mentioned this regular routine work of the Congress, and while this is just twice the amount of work confronting an ordinary Congress, this one has had some other things to do.

I want to enumerate some of these things. First, one of the very first things this Congress did was to extend suffrage to the women. Kansas women have had this right a long time, and I was glad to get here in time to help a Republican Congress give all the women the same right. Remember, the ranking minority—Democratic—member of the Committee on Suffrage fought this measure on the floor of the House. Second, remember when this Congress convened we were not even going on God's time; the sun no longer ruled the day; the moon had no control over the night; we had a new deal called McAdoodle, or some other kind of a donkey time. We have changed this and now have God's time. Please do not forget we secured this return to normal over the objection of the Executive, and over his second veto, and after our friends across the aisle had heard from home after the first veto. Third, Burleson had, for some reason known only to himself and his boss, after the signing of the armistice and before the famous Creel trip to France—where we paid so much rent and also damages to the buildings—taken over and was operating the cables, telephones, and telegraph. I repeat, no one knows why this was done, unless it was to prevent the American people from knowing what was going on in France. At any rate, it was done, and rates had been raised and service was getting bad. We returned them to their owners by a law, and I was glad to help in this. This adventure cost the Government $15,000,000.

When this Congress convened, the War Department had on hand a food supply for 3,000,000 more men than were in the Army for one year. They tried to get out of selling this food to hungry people, because some of the high-up officials had agreed with canneries and packers not to do so. We finally made them sell some of this before it spoiled, and this was no easy task, as they were the most determined bunch on letting this spoil I had ever encountered. They refused a long time to obey the law we passed making them sell it. I am proud to have voted for that resolution, which saved the Government more than the total cost of the whole congressional investigation.

Now, while I am on the subject of food I want to give you a fair, square statement on sugar. At the beginning of the war Congress appropriated money and authorized the organization of the Sugar Equalization Board. This was a corporation. The President of the United States was its president and held all the stock; there were eight directors. The President appointed all of them in 1918. They bought all the raw sugar, and, I must say, controlled the price, so that perhaps no one has ever complained to speak of. Now, in July, 1919, the Cuban raw sugar was for sale at 6¼ cents per pound. This corporation had the money belonging to our Government with which to buy it. They had a meeting, and seven of the directors wrote the President advising its purchase. One man wrote and advised against it. Now, the individuals and corporations engaged in this business would take no steps until the board decided what it wanted to do. The President ignored that letter; the board later wrote again; no answer. Do not misunderstand me. I do not think it was important which way he answered the letter. "Yes" would have been all right; "no" would have been just as good. "Yes," the board would have gone ahead; "no," and regular dealers would have bought it. Still up to this time no answer. Some one says the President was sick, but he was not sick then. He made his famous western trip after this. Now, what happened? Louisiana produces a little sugar. Their crop was poor; so we must get our sugar from Cuba. The so-called Department of Justice, intrusted with the duty of prosecuting profiteers, without any suit being brought, without any moral or legal right to do so, issued its now famous order that no Louisianian would be prosecuted for profiteering if he did not charge over 18 cents per pound for sugar. Result of failure of the Executive, with our money and the power to act, to make any move whatever, the department, his law-enforcing arm, nullifying the antiprofiteering law for all the people just to help a few friends in Louisiana.

Every householder in America is to-day paying as much as 10 cents a pound more than he should pay for every pound of sugar consumed by his family. Blame the Cubans? No. They held their raw sugar for four months on a reasonable price. Of course, when the head of our Government decided that 18 cents was not profiteering, they simply raised their price. This transaction will be known and designated by future generations as the sugar outrage.

This Congress has passed an Army reorganization bill, made necessary by the war. Now, the President, the Secretary of War, and the General Staff demanded that we have compulsory military training and compulsory military service of all boys between the ages of 19 and 21—three months' training and service for two years, subject to the call of the President. This bill, prepared by the executive officers, was introduced in both the Senate and House just as the President started West on the League of Nations speaking trip. It has as much to do with the defeat of the League of Nations as anything that happened. Congressmen and Senators who had not studied that feature of the league began to study. As a result, most all agreed, first, the President should not have power to send our troops abroad without Congress declaring war; that while a few Congressmen and some Senators favored compulsory military training, no one favored compulsory military service. So the Lodge reservations were agreed to by a large majority in the Senate; and the President, not then willing to have the treaty Americanized, had his trusted lieutenants in the Senate defeat it, though a majority voted for it, and he was able only to prevent its getting a two-thirds vote.

The House passed an Army reorganization bill; cut out both compulsory training and compulsory service; provided for an American Army; refused to adopt the Prussian system; kept intact the teaching of our forefathers; and left this a civil government, and not a military government; also, reduced the amount of money this bill would call for by more than $1,000,000,000 per year.

I want to be fair in this. Not only did the Republicans turn this down; the Democratic Members of the House had a caucus, and though they had a letter from the President begging them to take no action, they passed a resolution condemning the proposition. I congratulated them on it the next day. Mr. MONDELL had condemned it in public statements for weeks; I had written a letter, which was printed in most every paper in the seventh district, condemning it; this was within a week after the bill was sent down to this end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I congratulated the Democrats on the proposition that they had decided to follow Mr. MONDELL. Some of my good friends on the Democratic side said they had not voted to follow MONDELL but just refused to follow President Wilson's letter. However, the result was the same; it showed that a large majority, regardless of politics, were good Americans.

Mr. PARRISH. They did not follow some of the recommendations made at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. TINCHER. No. There were three or four Republicans in the Senate and half a dozen in this House who are willing to follow President Wilson and Secretary Baker and the other fellows. It is outrageous. I have no apologies for them. I have the greatest confidence that a good friend of mine, like the gentleman from Texas, stood by the people and helped us pass a reorganization bill that did not have any Prussianism in it, and left our Government a civil Government. I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee should overlook a measure of this kind in discussing what Congress has or has not done.

The first message this Congress had from the Chief Executive asked us to repeal the then war-time prohibition on wine and beer. This in the face of the fact that a sufficient number of States had adopted the eighteenth amendment, which clearly made it our duty to pass a permanent national prohibition law instead of repealing any of the then existing laws. Congress's answer to that message was "No." But, on the other hand, we passed the Volstead law, a permanent national bone-dry prohibition law. True, the President vetoed this law, and, true, Congress had to pass it over his veto, but this is as it should be. The President has always been against prohibition; the Republican Party has been for it; and the record is now correct. It shows the truth, and future generations should know the truth.

I can not refrain here from telling you a true joke that I know will sound like a fairy story. The Democratic State convention which met last month in my home State, at Wichita, Kans., in their resolutions pointed "with pride to the fact that under a Democratic President we had obtained national prohibition." These resolutions said nothing of its being a law over the protest and veto of the President. These same resolutions did, however, indorse the succession of the son-in-law to the throne.

This Congress found the railroads operated by the Government, the rates as high or higher than ever known in history, many, many men drawing from $15,000 to $25,000 a year in the Railroad Administration. Most of these men had no qualifications, except that they were deserving Democrats. Half of them would not know a switch frog from a bull frog. [Laughter.] Some were, no doubt, there to keep from going to war. Some had been defeated for Congress. Many were distantly related by blood or marriage to some of the high-ups; but they were all getting pay for their part in demoralizing the railroads and business. One of the first things I did was to try to get a harvest rate for the farmers. One of these golf-playing high brows made a statement to me of one-half hour that according to his view of economics this would not do. The next morning I saw in the papers where he had put in a one-half rate to points such as Atlantic City. I was angry. I went to see him again. I will not repeat what I said; he ordered me out. [Laughter.] Now he is out, but he and his kind stayed long enough to cost this Government $1,500,000,000. This at a time when every privately managed industry in the United States was worrying over excess profits. [Laughter.]

I never complained of the fact that these high brows didn't work but about one hour each day. What in the world would have happened if they had indulged in their mismanagement for a reasonable number of hours? [Laughter.] We have turned the roads back to their owners. I will not take time to go into detail on that law, but it is a good one, and in time under it we will get back to normal. It would take a week to enumerate the outrages this crowd committed while they held the roads. Every man knows enough to keep any man talking a whole day.

Gompers, who misrepresents labor on all occasions, says we are a "No Congress"; and I admit we have had to say no to the old gentleman several times. The first time I ever heard him was on the Capitol steps talking to the crowd of mostly foreigners who demanded that we nullify the eighteenth amendment instead of passing a prohibition law. I heard him say that day that if we did not repeal prohibition his followers would ignore the law. Of course, Congress said "No." [Applause.] Then I heard him advocate the Plumb plan, and again we had to say "No"; but while I could spend a day on the things we have had to say "No" to Gompers on, we have said "Yes" where justice spoke. [Applause.] I must not discuss here in detail all the things we have said "Yes" to, but let me mention a few in passing, any one of which one could make a whole speech about.

First, the American people asked for a reduction in appropriations. We gave them economy. This Congress passed the budget law, the most forward step for economic government in a century. The leasing bill, one of the most constructive pieces of legislation passed by any Congress. The water-power bill, important in its section. The cold-storage bill. The Sweet bill for soldiers of the late war. The Fuller pension bill for the benefit of the soldiers of the Civil War. The Sells pension bill for the relief of the soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition.

I know that some good business men are wondering why this Congress does not repeal more tax laws—and I notice Mr. McAdoo is advocating something of that kind. Some of us can remember how in 1916 the Congress repealed some revenue measures on the eve of a presidential election, right in the face of a deficiency. That was a Democratic, demagogue Congress; that act was a political one. Now, everyone knows we have to have money to pay expenses, and to cover Democratic deficiencies. True, Republicans and Democrats do now and always have disagreed as to how to raise that money. We have not a two-thirds majority even in the House. We have a free trader for an Executive, and more than one-third of the House is made up of free traders. To repeal tax laws and not arrange for the revenue by other laws would be hypocrisy of the worst type. The revenue laws Republicans believe in would be fought hard in both branches of Congress, and vetoed at the White House.

Everyone in Congress, regardless of politics, admits we would be wasting our time in trying to pass these laws over the veto. The Republican Party was successful in keeping down Government expenses and taxes in the past; wait until that party has a chance to pass a good, old-fashioned Republican protective tariff law, and you will see not only a change in our present unfair, unwieldy, unjust tax laws, but then, and not until then, will there be rest in labor circles, equity in the cost of living.

A return to normal government with the Republican Party in charge of the executive and legislative branches of our Government is normal government. It is the kind under which we have made all our progress.

Congress can pass laws, but there is an executive department of our Government to execute laws. The Sixty-fifth Congress passed a law that was supposed to curb profiteers, and that created what is known as the Grain Corporation. I do not know of anything wrong with that law, but it is an open secret that the law enforcers and administrators have used it to make it the most unpopular, and unworthy, and unjust law that was perhaps ever put on the statute books. Instead of prosecuting profiteers, they have encouraged them. The Grain Corporation has actually tried to show big millers how to fix up their statements and avoid taxes; and I have made the statement in committee, I have made it on the floor of the House, and made it before coming to Congress, and I now want to repeat it, that the only mills they have prosecuted have been those which, first, paid the farmer too much for his wheat, and, second, sold the flour too cheap to the consumer. Long before coming here I went with a miller before the Grain Corporation's representatives at Wichita, Kans. They were about to close his mill, and that was the only charge they had against him. Right to-day a mill in my district is closed because this man refused to be a liar, and a profiteer, and a crook. He insisted on paying the farmer more for wheat than other millers were, and insisted on selling his flour for less than it was being sold by other millers. And still this great Grain Corporation singles him out and have closed his mill.

I do not know this man personally. There may be some things wrong with him, but this is certainly a glaring example of how a law, no matter how meritorious, needs the just and fair enforcement by the enforcing officers. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, the tadpole is an ugly little wiggletail, but it is the beginning of the bullfrog, the loudest croaker and the greatest long-distance jumper ever developed in the gymnasium of nature.

A dignified inquisitorial committee of this House, directed by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], has for more than a year been engaged in investigating the tadpole profiteers who developed during the war, and it has been chasing the tadpoles that secured "cost-plus" contracts all over the country from Maine to California and then to Washington. All this, mark you, in total disregard of the commonest fact in natural history—that the tadpoles long ago developed into bullfrogs that have spread their spawn to produce millions more of tadpoles to grow into millions more of bullfrogs until, like the plague of Egypt, these bullfrogs have spread over the whole land "into the houses, the bedchambers, the beds, and even the kneading troughs" of the people to wring their profits from everything we use from the cradle to the grave, including the staff of life.

The curse of profiteering has become standardized until it not only robs the people but boasts of it. The war profiteers were confined to war contracts, were circumscribed by the needs of the Government in munitions and supplies; the profiteers of peace have no limitations on their genius and gall. They rob the people from dawn to dark and spend the night in jumping up prices to give us new sensations of indigestion at breakfast. Peace profiteering is confined to no section and to no class, but opportunity is the gauge of robbery, and he that has the best opportunity for profiteering makes the most of it and the most money.

When will the distinguished gentleman from Illinois and his inquisitorial colleagues catch up with the procession of bullfrog profiteers which is not simply marching on the bellies of the people, but is jumping from pinnacle to pinnacle of high prices while the committee is still digging into the records of war contracts where the tadpole profiteers were fattening off the Government? [Applause.] The waste of Government money was criminal and should be punished. I have no defense of any Government agent or any contractor who might participate in any revel of robbery, and I will support the committee in any recommendation it may make backed up by competent evidence; but I do not want to dwell in that alleged wallow of Government contracts while the peace profiteers are spreading their spawn over everything in this country and taking unrighteous toll from every necessity of the people. [Applause.]

The war ended nearly two years ago and so ended the opportunity of the war profiteers; but the prices of necessities of life have doubled those of the war time, but we are still digging into the war contracts to find the tadpoles of profiteering. The profiteers are nearly two years ahead of Congress and they are planning new methods for robbing the whole people. What are we going to do about it? Continue to trail behind the profiteers and only encourage them to greater effort to get while the getting is good, and outdistance the Government and the people?

One Senator complains of the Wall Street melon patch, but that is not the only melon patch in the country. There are others, and they take in the farms of the West and the cotton plantations of the South, where the hardy-handed tillers of the soil are demanding and securing big profits from the necessities of the dwellers in the cities of the East.

Have you followed the play of the Sugar Trust? Do you know that the Sugar Trust is the oldest, the most experienced, and probably the most unscrupulous profiteer we have, and its advances in prices are so fantastic as to suggest that Get Rich Quick Wallingford is the director of the operations, which will, it is said, net the trust a billion dollars in profits this year? The Sugar Trust has no limitations on its profiteering, because it controls the sugar production of Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and has its tentacles on other places that produce a surplus of sugar; and it has already made a cut-loaf cube of sugar for your coffee look like the pearl that Cleopatra dissolved in the glass of wine for her lover. [Laughter.] Can anyone here tell when the Sugar Trust was only a tadpole? I doubt it. Why, Uncle JOE CANNON, the Nestor of this House, was doing battle with this giant bullfrog nearly half a century ago, and I fancy that Uncle JOE could give us some interesting reminiscences of his early experiences if he would review the tariff fights of 30 and 40 years ago. I once saw a cartoon of Uncle JOE as St. George choking the dragon, and it seemed to me that it ought to represent his contest with the Sugar Trust at the time when he secured the adoption of an amendment to the celebrated McKinley bill placing sugar on the free list and giving a bounty to the domestic product. The trust did not want sugar made free, because it controlled the sugar market here and the production in Hawaii, from which islands sugar was free under a reciprocity agreement, and in Cuba, which was near enough to make the freight of little importance in holding the market against the beet sugar of Germany and Russia. There was little beet sugar made in this country at that time. But notwithstanding the opposition of the trust, Uncle JOE secured the adoption of his amendment after a battle like that between St. George and the dragon; and, incidentally, Uncle JOE was defeated for reelection that year, and I wonder how much the Sugar Trust contributed to that defeat. But sugar began to tumble in price from the enactment of that law, and within a year we could buy 20 pounds of sugar for a dollar, and as Uncle JOE's constituents carried home a dollar's worth of sugar and told the tale their wives declared that Uncle JOE should come back, and he did, to fight more dragons, as he has been doing for 30 years. [Applause.]

Twenty pounds of sugar for a dollar! To-day the price of sugar to the ultimate consumer is 30 cents a pound, more than double the price last January, and it is still advancing each week because the Sugar Trust has so long practiced profiteering that it has grown confident that it is bigger than the Government and can rob the people at will to swell its profits.

When sugar sold for 5 cents a pound we produced only one-sixth of our consumption, but when sugar is selling at 30 cents a pound we produce one-half of our total consumption. The tentacles of the trust appear to have entwined not only Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Hawaii, but the cane sugar of the South and the beet sugar of the West, and to-day the cost of sugar to the American people is estimated at nearly $3,000,000,000 a year and one billion of it goes to the profiteers in sugar. In other words, the Sugar Trust is permitted to tax the American people more than the Federal Government taxed them for all its activities and expenditures before the war with Germany.

The sugar profiteers glibly tell us that the increased price of sugar is due to the laws of supply and demand; to the decreased production and the enormous increase in consumption by the people of the United States, and they indulge in that old, familiar puzzle of per capita consumption; that the per capita consumption has increased from 40 pounds in 1880 to 89 pounds in 1914 and to 93 pounds last year. Now, who of you is conscious of having consumed 93 pounds of sugar last year, or used 16 pounds more than in 1918, when the per capita consumption was 77 pounds, or 15 pounds more than in 1916, the year before the war, when the retail price of sugar was 8 cents a pound?

The sugar profiteers would have us believe that we consume more sugar when we have to beg, bribe, and almost steal enough to sweeten our coffee at breakfast time than we did before the war, when the price was about one-fourth what it is now, or double the amount we consumed in 1890, when we could buy 20 pounds of sugar for a dollar.

But, gentlemen, these figures of per capita consumption of sugar represent the consumption of the candy makers and the sugar-water makers, who are more than suspected of close affiliation with the Sugar Trust and are adding to the profits of both ends of the combination. The experts of the Department of Labor nearly 20 years ago estimated that one-third of the sugar consumed in this country went into confectionery and soft drinks, and other estimates later increased this consumption of the manufacturers to one-half and two-thirds.

The collector of internal revenue in one district in New York City collected nearly a million dollars of taxes on candy and soft drinks in the months of February and March of this year, and estimated that these taxes represented sales of these luxuries amounting to $10,000,000. This was in one collection district and for two months—two months in which the people were trying in every way to secure enough sugar at any price to sweeten their breakfast coffee. Why, Barnum himself did not so presume on faking the whole people as have the affiliated industries of the Sugar Trust in fooling the Congress.

The gall of the profiteer is well illustrated by our master baker of the National Capital, Mr. Corby, who frankly admits that he made profits of $225,000 on bread last year after taking out $30,000 as his own salary; that he has not only several times advanced the price of bread this year but has indulged in short-weight practices in defiance of law to increase his profits. His only defense of his illegal practices is that he has the approval of a fair price committee composed of his fellow profiteers here in the District of Columbia. If I am not mistaken, this is the same Corby who financed and promoted the campaign against a referendum on the Sheppard bill to enable the people of Washington to vote their sentiments on prohibition. His recent developments explain his opposition to popular government by the vote of the people most concerned about their police regulations and local law for their government and control. When the Sheppard bill was finally enacted and the referendum defeated, Mr. Corby was given a monopoly in the manufacture of alcohol in the District of Columbia, probably in recognition of his valuable services in suppressing the American aspiration for self-government.

Mr. Corby is an excellent example of the self-righteous benefactor who casts his bread upon the waters of life to reap a profit for himself and proclaim it as a humanitarian plan for the benefit and elevation of the moral standards of the people. It pays to advertise even your roguery and defiance of the law.

It is an old saying that it costs as much to sell an article as to produce it. Ten years ago the Tariff Board analyzed the cost of producing and selling a suit of clothes. The wool grower received $2,32 for his product; the woolen manufacturer received $4.78 for the cloth; the cost of all materials entering into the suit, except the labor, was $7.55; the cost of making the clothes, $3.74; and the entire cost, from the woolgrower to and through the factory and the tailor shop, was $12.41. The suit sold for $25 to $30; and the profits of the jobber, the wholesaler, and retailer amounted to more than the entire cost of producing the suit of clothes.

That condition has been aggravated since the war with Germany; and to-day, apparently, it costs from two to three times as much to sell things as to produce them. President Wood of the American Woolen Co. protests that while his company earned big profits last year and is still earning big profits it has added only 75 cents to the cost of the cloth for a suit of clothes; but the $25 suit of five years ago has become a $75 suit now; and if Mr. Wood is correct, somebody else has absorbed $49.25 in getting the cloth into the suit and then to the ultimate consumer, and it would be interesting to find out who got the profits and who was the real profiteer. But the big combinations in the game protest that they are not profiteers, even though they admit to earning dividends ranging from 30 to 100 per cent and more. The retailers deny that they are profiteering, and we are left to puzzle over where the extra cost goes.

Mr. B. F. Yoakum, the celebrated railroad man, some years ago estimated that in the year 1911 the farmers received $6,000,000,000 for their products and that the consumers paid $13,000,000,000 for the same products. The railroads received $495,000,000 for transportation, and the entire cost of producing and transporting those products to market was less than half the cost to the consumer. That was in normal times. How much does the middleman get now?

A side light may be thrown on the situation by the increased danger to the ordinary citizen on the streets and roads from automobiles. We are told that the automobiles sold last year brought more money to the manufacturers than the entire cost of clothing the people, or furnishing the whole population with boots and shoes, or more than the cost of all the newspapers and magazines, or more than the entire cost of all the breadstuffs in the country. The passenger cars sold last year were double the number sold in 1918 and cost a billion and a half dollars. The profiteers were all riding in limousines or touring cars or electrics or Fords, according to their share of the profits; and while there were enough motor cars in the country to make 1 for every 14 of the population, out in Iowa and Nebraska, South Dakota and Kansas there was 1 automobile to each 6 of the population, while in Massachusetts there was 1 car to each 16 of population. So, measuring profits by joy riding, our farmer population in the West, where the Nonpartisan League flourishes, had a greater share of the profiteering than the industrial States of the East, which, by the way, contributed the largest part of the revenues of the Federal Government to pay the cost of the war, the cost of building good roads all over the country, killing off the chinch bugs, tobacco beetles, boll weevils, and teach the farmers how to make cottage cheese. New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois contributed last year more than one-half of all the revenues of the Government, or $2,196,139,071.65 out of the $3,839,950,612.05 which the Government collected in internal revenue.

So, while I admit there has been profiteering in the old Commonwealth which I, in part, represent, as I see the evidence of joy riding out on the prairies and plains among the hardy-handed farmers and see how little they contribute to the common welfare named in the Constitution, my heart does not respond to all the wails that come from the farming sections of the country as it did before I looked into the statistics of food cost and the meager revenues they contributed to Uncle Sam last year.

The tadpole has grown into a bullfrog all over the country in every line of endeavor and every class of citizen, and the question still is how to catch up with the bullfrog. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, it is frequently assumed that after the declaration of war Congress, by legislative enactment, directed the President to take over the operation of the railroads. This is an error. In pursuance of a provision in the national defense act of 1916 the President on the 1st day of January, 1918, without legislative direction took over the railroads, and it was not until March 21, 1918, almost three months thereafter, that the act of Congress was approved, which is commonly known as the Federal-control act. This act recited the fact that the President had taken over the operation of railroads, made provision for the compensation for their use, and appropriated $500,000,000 as a revolving fund to pay the expenses of Federal control.

The question is often raised as to the advisability of the act of the President in taking over the railroads. It is urged with much force that the same or better results so far as war service was concerned could have easily been brought about by providing by law that transportation for war purposes should have preference and by suspending such restrictive laws as hindered unified action by the carriers.

All the inherent evils of Government ownership and paternalistic legislation accompanied governmental operation of railroads, and these evils not only crippled the railroad service but reached out into every other governmental activity. The vast additional expense of Government operation is frequently cited as proof of the error in taking over the roads. It must be remembered, however, that the real purpose of taking over the transportation facilities was to permit their unhindered and unrestricted use as a part of the machinery of war, and if this purpose was better served than it could have been under private operation without accompanying evils that outweighed the benefits the course was, of course, justified. A discussion of this controverted question would now be academic. One should form his opinion on the subject from a study of the facts.

It is unfortunate, however, that there has been such an extensive organized propaganda to create the impression that Government operation of railroads was a financial success and that it had no attending evils. It is much more in keeping with sound statesmanship to frankly acknowledge the faults so that the actual virtues, if any, may not also be discredited.

Power was conferred by Congress upon the President to disregard all laws which he might find in the way of the efficient and economical operation of the railroads. He was given power to increase rates without limit. He was given power to disregard the antitrust laws; to disregard the directions of shippers as to the routing of traffic; to pool facilities; to coordinate and unify operations; and, generally, without regard to existing laws or legislative policies, to do all the things which were, in his judgment, necessary to the most efficient and economical operation.

He promptly, through the agencies he had created, proceeded to the exercise of these powers. He increased wages and he increased rates.

The Director General stated to the House Committee on Appropriations on June 3, 1919, that employees' wages per hour had increased 50 or 52 per cent since 1917, the year before Federal control, and unit costs of materials and supplies from 20 to 35 per cent. Yet the operating expenses for the first six months of 1919 showed an increase over the corresponding months of 1917 amounting to $735,000,000, or nearly 55 per cent.

The Railroad Administration reports that the total ton-miles of roads in class 1 during the first six months of 1917 were 207,631 millions, while during the first six months of 1919 there were only 178,083 millions, a decrease of 29,548 millions, or 14.2 per cent. Passenger traffic statistics for the same periods are not available, but it is beyond doubt that any increase in passenger traffic was not sufficient to offset the decline in freight traffic. Thus, with a reduced traffic in the first six months of 1919 as compared with the same period of 1917, increases in unit costs of 20, 35, and 51 to 52 per cent produced an increase in total cost amounting to 55 per cent.

Similarly, ton-miles for the whole of the year 1919 were 394,804 millions, as compared with 427,342 millions in 1917, which was a decrease of 32,538 millions, or 7.6 per cent. Passenger miles increased from 39,361 millions in 1917 to 46,145 millions in 1919, the increase being 6,784 millions, or 17.2 per cent. This increase of 6,784 millions passenger miles was not sufficient to offset the decline of 32,538 millions ton-miles in freight traffic. Yet with a smaller traffic in 1919 than in 1917, and with unit costs of labor and material showing lower rates of increases than the increase in operating expenses, the latter was greater in 1919 than in 1917 by $1,519,000,000, or nearly 54 per cent.

The conclusion seems to be inevitable that the Government plant was operated less efficiently and less economically than was the same plant in private hands.

This doubtless is to a large degree explained by the weakness in organization and the comparatively small output of labor and wastage in materials, all of which are inseparable from the transaction of all business of whatever kind by governmental agencies.

Large amounts paid out to appointees of the administration dispel the expectation that operation by the Government would end large salaries. The report of the Director General containing a list of all officers and employees as of date, January 1, 1919, shows, among thousands of others under $10,000, that the following salaries were paid, ranging from $10,000 to $50,000 per year:

General office:
Assistant Director General	25,000
Assistant to Assistant Director General	12,000
Finance and purchases treasurer	10,000

In February, 1919, the Director General submitted a statement to the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce (Hearings, pt. 12, p. 1719) showing that the total number of railroad employees had increased from 1,703,684 in December, 1917, to 1,843,530 in January, 1919, an increase of 139,846. A recent report issued by the Director General gives the number of employees in January, 1920, as 1,953,571, a further increase of 110,000 employees, or a total increase of approximately 250,000 during the period of Government operation.

The traffic handled was only slightly greater in January, 1920, than in December, 1917, the freight traffic being greater by 8.8 per cent and the passenger traffic smaller by 6.5 per cent. Yet Government operation in the latter month utilized 250,000 more employees than did private operation in the former month.

Notwithstanding these facts, this was a period of poorest service from the standpoint of the public—shippers could not get cars, people were suffering for lack of coal because it could not be shipped, and many industrial plants had been closed because of lack of transportation service.

Reference has been made to increases of wages made by the Government; these increases aggregated about one thousand millions of dollars per annum. It is also claimed that the railroads under private operation would have been obliged to have put this same charge on the public. This latter statement has something in it of conjecture, but there is one feature of the situation that may be emphasized without fear of successful contradiction.

To-day the railway employee in Maine or in Florida or in California is given the same rate of wages as the employee doing the same class of work in New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, or Indiana, regardless of the differences in the levels of living costs in different localities, in rural or urban communities, or in conditions of labor as between different railways.

This standardization of wages without regard to differences in conditions between different communities, and without regard to the scale of wages in other industries in these communities, has tended to unsettle the industrial equilibrium.

It has also been a distressing thing to the employees to witness the great injustice in the payment of wages. The amount of wages paid has not been governed by the nature of the work, the difficulty and responsibility of the task, and the skill required in its performance. Workers of great skill and experience, performing work for which they were thus peculiarly fitted and which could not have been done except for such skill and experience, have seen untrained and unskilled men working near them rewarded by higher wages. Such discrimination had a very depressing effect upon the employees and furnished no incentive to the employee to excel in order that he might be given more important duties.

If any student of political economy had been asked prior to Government operation of the railroads what danger he considered the most likely, he probably would have given this answer: "The Executive of the Nation as the head of a political party will probably be ready to make vast expenditures and deal generously in paying out money, but because of the political effect of the unpleasant task he may fail to collect sufficient money in rates to pay the bill."

This administration failed at this point of greatest danger, failed completely and miserably. Knowing that it was running behind over $1,000,000 a day, the administration lacked the courage to put on the necessary freight and passenger rates to pay the bill. When this point is made against the administration they at once hurl back the answer, "Do you want to increase freight rates?" There is but one answer to this question. The railroad business should pay its own way and no part of the freight rate should be paid by taxation. If a milliner in Kansas City wants Parisian hats that have been shipped to the New York ports, she and her customers should pay the freight and no part of it should be taxed upon the farmer in Indiana and the cotton grower of Alabama. If a jockey club in Maryland wants to ship race horses from Kentucky, those interested in that transfer should pay the freight and the grape growers of California and the sheep growers of Montana should not be taxed to help pay the bill. It is an easy and pleasant task to advance wages, and I am glad to know that needed advances were made; but if this made it necessary to initiate greater freight rates and greater passenger rates, the mere fact that the task was unpleasant should not have deterred the administration.

This weakness of the administration accounts for our great money loss. The cost in money of Government operation has mounted higher and higher until the total stupendous sum has gone far beyond the highest predictions from any source. The grand total of the Government's obligations during the period of operations reached the sum of $2,275,000,000, as estimated by the Railroad Administration. Of this sum it is expected that the Government will in time be made whole for sums advanced, investments made, and loans to the railroads to the amount of $1,146,000,000. In detail the items are as follows:

Total expenditures and obligations of Railroad Administration		$2,275,000,000
Indebtedness of railroads and other properties, including express companies, to Government at termination of Federal control, estimated by Director General	$861,963,932
Investment of Railroad Administration in additions and betterments to inland waterways	14,581,126
New loans to railroads for period of 26 months following Federal control	270,000,000
Total		1,146,000,000
Net loss to the Government		1,129,000,000

It is estimated by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in his report accompanying the deficiency appropriation bill that there is a loss of something like $250,000,000 in decreased value of railroad and Government securities which the Railroad Administration took over. This amount can at best be only an estimate, but if it is an accurate estimate the irretrievable loss for 26 months' operation is brought up to $1,379,000,000.

One could speak for hours and point out specific concrete instances of great and unnecessary waste by this Railroad Administration. For instance, everyone is familiar with the course of personal publicity industriously pursued by Director General McAdoo from the time he was made Director General until he resigned. He sought in every conceivable way almost regardless of cost to bring his own name before the public. Rubber stamps for office use throughout the country were first issued, marked "United States Railroad Administration." When Mr. McAdoo got in full swing he had those rubber stamps piled in the waste baskets, and new ones marked "United States Railroad Administration, W. G. McAdoo, Director General," were provided. He posted up conspicuously in railroad cars, in stations, in shops, and other public places large placards frequently containing information of little value, but always at the top in bold letters was "W. G. McAdoo, Director General"; and then, to make assurance doubly sure, you would find at the bottom "W. G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads." I hold in my hand a sample of one of many dozens of bulletins printed and sent out. It contains but one page and but a very small amount of reading matter. Nevertheless the name "W. G. McAdoo, Director General," is near the top, and again near the bottom I find "W. G. McAdoo, Director General of Railroads." When the advance in wages was made by Director General McAdoo he issued thousands upon thousands of useless bulletins calling the attention of the employees to the total amount of additional wages paid them by the Railroad Administration. These announcements were usually coupled with some other incidental appeal to furnish the body and excuse for the advertisements, but to any observing man the whole plan was a transparent publicity scheme. The total loss of the Railroad Administration in operating the railroads was approximately $50,000,000 per month during 26 months.

"Where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise." The hundred millions of our people during this squandering period were lulled, Creeled, and McAdooed into a false sense of security and trust. They watched with great contentment the glowing sun as it set in the west day after day. They did not know that every time the golden disk went down in the western horizon this profligate Railroad Administration had taken from their already flattened purses the enormous sum of $1,666,666.66. It would not have added to their comfort to know that part of this enormous sum was used as personal propaganda to advance the personal political ambitions of the Director General of Railroads, over whose head came the voice from the White House saying, "This is my beloved son-in-law, in whom I am well pleased." [Laughter.]

It is claimed in defense of the enormous amount of the deficit that the amount paid to the railroads as compensation amounted to a great sum, and that the Railroad Administration had no responsibility, so far as the payment of rent to the railroads was concerned, and that this was fixed by Congress. Without meaning in the least to assert that the amount paid the railroads for rental compensation was excessive, I want to dispel the illusion that the amount was fixed by Congress.

The Federal control act passed by Congress contained this unequivocal provision:

> The President * * * is hereby authorized to agree with and to guarantee to any such carrier making operating returns to the Interstate Commerce Commission, that during the period of such Federal control it shall receive as just compensation an annual sum, payable from time to time in reasonable installments for each year and pro rata for any fractional year of such Federal control, not exceeding a sum equivalent as nearly as may be to its average annual railway operating income for the three years ended June 30, 1917.

The amount fixed by Congress was merely the maximum over which the President could not go, and he went the full limit allowed by Congress. I am merely calling attention to this law so that it may be known that the entire responsibility for the amount of the rental lies with the President and with the Railroad Administration.

It is also claimed that a considerable part of the transportation service was for the War and Navy Departments of the Government, and hence that this furnished an excuse for the deficit. The fallacy of that argument lies in the false assumption that this was performed without cost. As a matter of fact this was paid for by these departments and was a most profitable source of revenue. The carriage of immense numbers of soldiers riding second class was done at great profit. The Treasury Department's statement from January 1, 1919, to March 31, 1920, contains these illuminating items:

Transportation charges collected:
War Department	$183,536,691.92
Navy Department	10,031,241.66

This is in addition to the immense amounts paid directly for transportation by the soldiers and sailors themselves and takes no account of the amounts received during 1918.

The freight and passenger rates were increased, and the first schedule of freight rates, because of its great inequalities and lack of notice, wrought havoc with the industries of the country. In some cases there was a percentage increase of a little over 25 per cent, and in other cases there was a flat increase of so much per ton, which reached as high as 200 per cent. The power over freight rates was used to prevent the movement of certain commodities. For instance, rates on gravel and sand were increased, and the reason given was that it was hoped to cut down the amount of the shipment. Important differentials for different shipping localities established on an equitable basis, after careful hearings and in force for many years, were destroyed almost without notice and the industries of important industrial centers were completely shut down, and in some instances monopolies were thus permitted. The Illinois Traffic League in a letter to me, dated July 30, referring to these rates, said:

At the time of the passage of the Federal control act, in March, 1918, the power was given to the President of the United States to initiate rates on all railroads under Federal control, and the Interstate Commerce Commission was by the same act deprived of its powers to pass upon such rates, except in the way of review, after the rate should become effective. For 30 years the shippers of this country had striven to establish the authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review, suspend, and otherwise pass upon the establishment of transportation rates before such rates became effective, this being necessary for the protection of the shipping interests of this country, and their efforts were finally rewarded.

It was understood and clearly so stated at the time this power was taken away from the commission and placed in the hands of the President, that it would only be used in case of extreme emergency and as a matter of war necessity, but as soon as the Railroad Administration took hold of the situation these promises were disregarded and the power thus given to the President was used indiscriminately by the Director General of Railroads to change any and every rate he saw fit, at his own pleasure, anywhere in the United States, sometimes on one day's notice, thus leaving the shipping interests of the country entirely at the mercy of the Railroad Administration and without adequate recourse of any character. It is true that traffic committees were formed and consideration given to many rate changes, but in the majority of cases this consideration was only perfunctory and very little real benefit to the shippers.

The Illinois Sand & Gravel Co., in a resolution passed August 23, 1919, stated:

The general effect of this arbitrary action of the Director General has been more or less disastrous, former rate relationships having been destroyed in many instances and undue burdens having been forced upon many commodities, particularly basic materials used in building and construction.

Instance after instance could be cited to show how the rate-making power was so abused and disadvantageously used that the shippers were placed in desperate straits to carry on their business.

As to the maintenance of railroad property, provided for by the railroad-control act and by the standard contract with each railway corporation, it is conceded by everyone who is familiar with the situation that the facilities and equipment of the railroads were permitted to deteriorate to an alarming extent and that numerous replacements imperatively required were not authorized; even toward the end of Federal control, when arrangements to do so could have been made with considerably less difficulty than during the war, practically no extensions or new tracks were constructed; only sufficient maintenance to enable continued operation was performed; less than 50 per cent of the normal average wastage in freight cars and locomotives was replaced, and practically no passenger cars were purchased by the Government, although the railroads require approximately 2,000 new units of such equipment each year in order to render adequate service. To the argument that perhaps the railroad corporations could not have done better, the reply is that prior to 1918 most of them gave maintenance and replacements preferred attention and turned over to the Government plants in comparatively up-to-date operating condition; and the difficulties encountered by the Government during the period of Federal control that followed the armistice, which covered 16 of the 26 months that the railroads were operated by the Government, are fairly comparable to those that had to be contended with by the railroads when they had charge of their properties, most of the differences being due to causes resulting from the policies of the Government. The great body of splendid Americans composing the railroad employees are not resopnsible for the disastrous results of Government operation.

But, Mr. Chairman, these great disadvantages and these great financial losses pale into insignificance when compared with the disastrous effect upon the political life of our Republic. Politics was not adjourned during the war nor after its close. It was found that some 2,000,000 voters were directly and pecuniarily interested in every important step taken by the Railroad Administration. I have illustrated how the Director General advertised and emphasized the increases in wages by numerous unnecessary bulletins; but it must be remembered that he had been an active politician before securing this political plum, and he soon saw in the dependency of this great class of voters upon his every action the golden opportunity to capitalize for political purposes the policies he pursued. He early issued his statement that the policy under private operation had been "The public be damned," by which he sought to stir up sentiment against private operation. He followed up his policy of undertaking to take personal and political credit for advances in railroad wages. I quote the following newspaper report of a speech made by Director General McAdoo in El Paso, Tex., on April 17, 1918.

He asked the men not to become impatient because of the delay of the fixing of the new wage schedule, adding that if a raise was granted to the railroad men it would be retroactive, and they would then be able to buy Liberty bonds. "You are all my boys, and I don't intend to let anyone kick you around, for I will defend you to the limit when you are right, and you won't go wrong, I am sure," he said.

After the war a drive was determined upon to create sentiment in favor of retaining the railroads, and the administration forces were prime movers in this drive. The first objective was to secure an extension of the period of Government operation for an additional five years, and, once agreed upon, a propaganda was started through railroad labor circles such as the country has rarely ever before witnessed, and this was the signal for renewing exaggerated claims of efficiency and economy in the railroad administration and for new efforts to convince the railroad employees that Government operation had been to their benefit. This extension, of course, would have kept the railroads beyond the presidential campaign.

On January 3, 1919, after the signing of the armistice and when every consideration should have been looking toward the ending of Government control, Mr. McAdoo appeared before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate and urged the passage of a law continuing the Government control for five years longer. In his speech, which was given wide publicity, he made great claims concerning economies and reforms under Government control. He then laid the basis for an extension of five years in the following language:

In view of the far-reaching importance of any solution of the railroad question which may be adopted, the public is entitled to have, before the present Federal control shall be terminated, a reasonably fair test under peace conditions of the advantages to be derived from these reforms. * * * This is why I have urged that Federal control be extended until January 1, 1924.

Mr. McAdoo's successor, Director General Hines, an estimable gentleman and able executive, also similarly urged Government control of the railroads for a period of five years, and his argument was so nearly like that of Mr. McAdoo that it suggested a meeting of minds on the question. On February 3, 1919, before the Senate committee, Director General Hines very strongly urged the five-year extension. He said:

But I believe the five-year extension would be much better, because it would give added stability. Of course, there can be no guaranty that there will be a permanent solution in the three-year period, and the additional two years will give a margin of safety which will remove the uncertainty which would arise if the end of the three-year period approached and there appeared danger that no legislation would be accomplished. * * * We know that a large body of the people of this country has a settled conviction that this question can not be successfully disposed of except through Government ownership. The arguments of the Government ownership advocates are temporarily at a discount by reason of a reaction from all forms of Government control, this being a perfectly natural aftermath of the war. Now, is it the part of statesmanship for anyone to recommend a hasty settlement of this question in a period when the permanent convictions of a large part of the public are for the time being suffering a partial eclipse by reason of a purely temporary state of mind? (Hearings, pp. 893–895.)

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No; I decline to yield.

It is inconceivable that both of these gentlemen made these urgent recommendations without the approval of the appointing power. The end of the war, however, marked the beginning of the time when the public was heard. The people had patriotically and very patiently borne what were thought to be necessary evils during war time, but in peace times, through the press over the country, through resolutions of thousands of organizations, the public demanded that Government operation should cease. After the Republican organization in Congress had gone on record in favor of their speedy return, the President, reading his ouija board aright, yielded to this insistent public demand and in a message stated that the railroads should be returned. However, there had been set in motion an organization among the railroad employees for the retention of the railroads which did not terminate when the President changed his mind. The amiable gentleman from Tennessee, ranking Democratic member of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, which had charge of railroad legislation, had caught the fever, and it never abated with him. On May 19, 1919, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] introduced a bill in this House to continue the Federal control of railroads until January 1, 1924. On November 5, 1919, he introduced a bill to continue Government control and operation of railroads until December 31, 1921. On December 2, 1919, he introduced an additional bill to continue Government operation of railroads until December 31, 1921, and on August 2, 1919, by request, he introduced another bill, known as the Plumb plan, which would require the Government to purchase the railroads for all time to come and turn them over to a corporation to be run on the soviet plan for 100 years.

And, Mr. Chairman, all of this clamor for extension of Government operation of the railroads and for the Plumb plan can be traced directly to the political effect of Government operation of railroads, and the exaggerated claims that were drummed into the employees' ears during that time that they were receiving special favors from the administration in power. The effect on our body politic of Government operation of railroads was to accentuate the studied effort by the radicals of to-day to bring about class consciousness.

Mr. Chairman, the claim that this Government is for one class and against another is an infamous falsehood and an imposition. Our Government is seeking to promote the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

But if class shall be arrayed against class we may well tremble for the future.

A republic differs essentially from other forms of government. The character of the government depends not alone upon the high average of intelligence of the individual, but upon the manner in which that intelligence is crystallized through popular representation into the laws of the country. If there shall develop strong conscious jealous classes, then the member of the classes will more and more be guided by selfish purposes. The part which he takes in shaping the affairs of the nation will be to carry out his selfish ends, and the Government shall no longer reflect the sum total of intelligent statesmanship of its people, but there will be reflected in the country's government, in the turn of their respective ascendancies, the sum total of their efforts for class advancement. [Applause.]

Let us hold to the fundamental truths that have made us great. This is the day for steady, unbiased, thoughtful action. We must not indorse every fanciful scheme nor embrace every novel proposal, but rather cling to those things which are tried and true and march steadily on in our progress to the high destiny which is within our reach.

The Republic at war and the Republic in peace require the same sort of patriotism, but that does not mean that the governmental policy shall be the same. In fact, that policy should just be reversed. The distinctive feature of the Government of these United States has been freedom of action for the individual; freedom of action, to be sure, in an orderly way with careful recognition of the rights of others. The great industries of the country, the vast business of the Nation, the phenomenal prosperity of our people, the wonderful happiness in our land have all been brought about because of the recognition of this principle. Whereas other countries united business and the State, it has been the purpose of our statesmanship to separate the two. We have been most happy and contented during the times when the Government least touched business affairs. Take our transportation system, for instance. The Republic of the United States, because of its vast contiguous territory and its diversified industries, has become a great transportation country. We have one-third of the railroads of the entire world. We give the best rates and the best service of any transportation system in the wide world, and it has all been built up and developed by private initiative, by private capital, by private ingenuity, and private genius. Our great network of electric railways, our other great public utilities, have all been developed in the same way.

During that time of great development the Government has dealt with distinctly governmental affairs. It has not undertaken to carry on the business of the country. By legislation it prevented evil practices in business, but that is a governmental function. It provided proper rules of conduct and stayed the hand of the transgressor, but that was a governmental function.

Now, when the war came on it required the united strength of the Nation against a foreign foe and hence required an entirely different governmental policy. The interest of industry as industry, the interest of business as business, the interest of the railroads as such, all became secondary to the necessary use of all these elements of strength in assembling the might of the Nation to strike effective blows against our foe. The freedom of action of the individual had to give way to the all-absorbing demand for the force of the individual's action as a unit in our national force which we applied against the enemy.

The marvelous way in which the American people submitted to this change in governmental policy and the phenomenal result of that achievement have taught the world that individual freedom in peace time does not prevent the mastery of the Nation in war time.

But now we have another problem. Having made this radical change in governmental policy during war time, will the genius of our statesmanship be able to shift the gears and return us to our normal status? The problem is a simple one so far as rules are concerned. No deep study is required to know that the Government must once more return to purely governmental functions. Rapid strides have been made toward this end. We have returned the telegraph and telephone wires to private operation; we have returned the cables to their private owners. Some of our commissions and bureaus have been disbanded and all others which are unnecessary should be abolished. Private operation of railroads has been restored. We must continue this course until there is a complete divorcement of business and Government. [Applause.] And in keeping with this policy the Congress passed the Esch-Cummins railroad bill, which the President said, in signing, "marked a new era."

The one man who is entitled more than anyone else to the credit for this great constructive measure is the chairman of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH]. [Applause.] He recognized the drafting of this railroad bill as a big task. He brought to the accomplishment of the task his many years of experience in legislation affecting transportation. He devoted practically his entire time for many months to the work on the railroad bill. His rich knowledge of railroad affairs did not hinder him in the least from studying ideas suggested by others. He recognized, as every practical legislator recognizes, that no important bill can meet the entire approval of all of the legislators who must necessarily take part in its passage. Ready to yield to convincing argument of others, yet firm in his own convictions, he easily became the master mind in the drafting of the bill. He is entitled to the congratulations of his colleagues in the House upon the passage of this bill which bears his name. [Applause.]

Let us examine the provisions of this act. After the enactment of certain provisions made necessary by Government control, it so amends the former act to regulate commerce as to give complete Federal regulation in every respect where the public may have an interest and provides the machinery for the voluntary adjustment of railway disputes. It then provides a rule of rate making so arranged as to provide sufficient revenue to adequately sustain transportation and yet not produce unconscionable returns to the strong roads.

The act proceeds upon the assumption that transportation is a necessity; that it is a public function; that it is the duty of the Government to see that it does properly function; that this duty not only requires restrictive provisions by which the public is protected from any imposition on the part of the carriers but also requires provisions which shall foster and encourage the business of transportation by the quasi public corporations.

The restrictive features fix the rates that may be charged, control the practices and regulations that may be made effective, prescribe in great detail and with minute exaction how the roads must be financed, the manner in which securities may be issued, and the way in which the capital shall be expended so that watering stock is made impossible. Consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission must be obtained to construct new lines of railroad, to extend the old lines, or to acquire or operate any line. No line or part of line can be abandoned without the consent of the commission. The railroad may be required to furnish facilities for transportation, including cars, locomotives, and other necessary equipment, and, if it does not possess them, to provide itself with adequate facilities to properly serve the public. It must distribute cars in the manner prescribed by the commission. It must permit other roads to use its terminals, under proper terms including reasonable compensation, when directed by the commission to do so. These instances are merely illustrative of the restrictive regulations by which complete control is given to the Government over the instruments of transportation.

Having given to the Interstate Commerce Commission the fullest authority to supervise the charges that shall be made and to determine the manner in which capital may be secured, and having granted to the commission the power to fix rates, we have determined as a legislative policy that the roads in any given rate group, considered as a whole, which are honestly, efficiently, and economically managed, shall have such rates as will yield a fair return on the aggregate property value. For a period of two years this return is to be fixed by the commission as nearly as may be at 5½ per cent, and with permission for an additional one-half of 1 per cent under certain specified conditions.

This function of the commission does not differ materially from the function already exercised by the commission, except that the bill adopts the 5½ per cent for two years as a matter of legislative policy rather than leaving it to the commission. This is based upon property value and not one cent is to be paid on "watered" stock. The story that the bill authorizes freight rates upon $8,000,000,000 of watered stock is made out of the whole cloth; the rates must be based upon the actual value of the property and the amount of the stock does not enter into it.

The charge that the rule of rate making is a 6 per cent guaranty is just as untrue. The Government does not make good if the property does not yield 6 per cent. The loss is borne entirely by the railroads.

The clearest illustration of meeting the railroad problem in a constructive way is found in the provision for a recapture by the Government, to be used for transportation purposes, of one-half the amount earned by any road above 6 per cent. Where you have two competing roads between two shipping points these roads of necessity must charge the same rate, otherwise the road charging the lesser rate would get all the traffic. Yet a rate fixed for the carriage of freight and passengers between those points might yield an unconscionably large return to one road which by reason of a better route, roadbed, or other similar causes was able to operate at less cost; and yet the yield for the other road under this rate might not be large enough to even approach a fair return. This is the problem of the strong and the weak road, and that has been called by many students of the subject the real railroad problem.

The greatest confusion has arisen over the labor provisions of the act. The Senate bill contained an antistrike clause; the House bill contained provisions for the voluntary adjustment of railway disputes. The bill as it passed rejected the antistrike features entirely and left merely the machinery for the voluntary settlement of railway disputes, although with some modifications of the original provisions of the House bill. Many railroad men and other union-labor men had written Members to vote against the bill when it was thought it would contain the antistrike provision, but since the bill has passed and a clear study has been afforded the labor provisions have been highly commended in many labor circles.

Title III embraces the labor provisions. It provides first that the railroad companies and their officers on the one hand and the employees and agents on the other hand shall hold conferences and try to make an amicable adjustment of their disputes. This is a most wise provision. For many years these hundreds of thousands of employees have been able, through negotiations in most cases, to effect satisfactory settlements with their employers. Very seldom have they reached a deadlock. When they sit down at a table together and frankly discuss their differences the solution frequently can be easily found. And this bill does not undertake to compel the men to litigate their troubles before the boards; in fact, it is hoped and expected that the majority of the disputes will be settled between the parties themselves.

It is recognized, however, that it is extremely important to avoid any interruption of our transportation system, and hence there are to be organized "railroad boards of labor adjustment," known as "adjustment boards," made up wholly of the representatives of the railroads interested and the employees interested, in order that a dispute assuming discomforting proportions may be submitted in an orderly way to a tribunal ready for its consideration. This board will decide disputes involving only "grievances, rules, or working conditions."

There is also established what is known as the "labor board," composed of nine members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Three members representing the employees and subordinate officials are appointed from a list of not less than six named by the employees.

Three representing the management group are appointed from a list of not less than six named by the railroads.

Three representing the public are named by the President upon his own initiative. Vacancies are filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

The members hold office for a term of five years, except that shorter terms of varying length are provided in the first organization, so that only one-third of the board will leave in one year.

This labor board has two functions. One is to hear disputes involving grievances, rules, or working conditions, where a decision can not be reached by the adjustment board. The other function is the original consideration of "all disputes with respect to the wages or salaries of employees or subordinate officials of carriers" not amicably decided between the parties themselves. Five of the nine members must concur, and this must include at least one of the public group in order for their deliberation to amount to a decision.

The employees are not compelled to submit their grievances to the board, and there is no compulsory arbitration, and there is nothing in the law making a strike unlawful.

In reaching their determination the board shall consider:

(1) The scales of wages paid for similar kinds of work in other industries;

(2) The relation between wages and the cost of living;

(3) The hazards of the employment;

(4) The training and skill required;

(5) The degree of responsibility;

(6) The character and regularity of the employment; and

(7) Inequalities of increases in wages or of treatment, the result of previous wage orders or adjustments.

The main office of the labor board is in Chicago, but, if necessary, it may meet at other places. The board is given the usual powers granted to commissions for the issuance of subpœnas and securing the attendance of witnesses.

The act does not provide for the enforcement of the decisions, but ample provision is made for giving notice to the parties and publishing the decisions to acquaint the public with the result.

Thus the Congress rejected the antistrike provision and substituted in its place the machinery for the amicable adjustment of disputes and a Government tribunal in which those interested, the employees, the railroads, and the public, have representation. No one claims that the millennium has come in the matter of railroad labor disputes, but it is the firm belief of those who have studied this perplexing problem that this will reduce friction to the very minimum and assure to all interested the "even-handed justice" and square deal to which every American is entitled.

The act is now effective. The Labor Board has been created, consisting of the following personnel:

FOR THE PUBLIC.

R. M. Barton, of Tennessee, for many years a member of the Tennessee Court of Appeals.

G. W. W. Hanger, of the District of Columbia, Assistant Commissioner of the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation.

Henry Hunt, formerly mayor of Cincinnati, Ohio.

FOR THE RAILWAY EXECUTIVES.

Horace Baker, of Ohio, former general manager of the Queen & Crescent Lines.

J. H. Elliott, of Texas, former general manager of the Texas & Pacific.

William L. Park, of Illinois, former vice president of the Chicago Great Western.

FOR THE EMPLOYEES.

Albert Phillips, of Ohio, vice president of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.

A. C. Wharton, of Missouri, president of the railroad employees' department of the American Federation of Labor.

J. J. Forrester, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks.

The board in an orderly way is now considering the railroad-wage question, involving practically every employee of the railroads and a stupendous sum of money, and practically everyone now agrees that the amount of money involved and the importance of the question was too great to be settled in any way except by the Government tribunal.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has provided the necessary groups, and is now holding hearings on the rate schedule. The beneficent provisions of the bill, which gives complete control by the commission in any emergency created by congestion, have been invoked.

It will take many years, Mr. Chairman, for our transportation system to return to normal, but this great measure has marked the pathway to take us out of chaos into the realm of order, and the menace to our well-ordered Government has been removed. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following Senate concurrent resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution 27.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress hereby respectfully declines to grant to the Executive the power to accept a mandate over Armenia as requested in the message of the President dated May 24, 1920.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate expresses its profound sorrow on account of the death of the Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, late a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute may be made to his high character and distinguished public service.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by our colleague, Hon. EDWARD T. LITTLE, in the city of Pittsburgh yesterday, Memorial Day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an address of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is this distinctly a Memorial Day address?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes; delivered in the city of Pittsburgh yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the land and water power legislation of this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the budget.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the budget bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELTY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short extract from a speech delivered by ex-President Taft to the Ohio Society of this city.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extract referred to is as follows:

VALUE OF LONG SERVICE IN CONGRESS—SPEECH OF PRESIDENT TAFT BEFORE THE OHIO SOCIETY OF WASHINGTON.

There is a truth as profound as political experience can make it in the following passage from the speech of President Taft before the Ohio Society of Washington:

"Why is it that the small States of the East exercise so much power in Congress? It isn't because an eastern man has any more capacity in the matter of legislation than a western man—certainly not more than an Ohio man. It is because when they get a good Representative they keep him as long as he 'lives,' and then he has the influence that vastly exceeds the more numerical representation of pupulation."

Though a man were Hazlitt and Macaulay combined, he would not be a great writer unless he had been of the guild a while. We are told by Edmund Burke himself that it was by slow degrees and constant discussion that Charles James Fox became the greatest parliamentary debater the world ever saw. Fox entered the British Commons before he was 20 years old. He remained a member of that body until his death, at the age of 57. In opposition he did as much to advance the cause of good government as Pitt did in power, for he kept Pitt not only on the alert but on his good behavior.

Had Fox been an American and a Member of our Congress, he would have been fortunate if he had been chosen to and served in 10 Congresses—20 years. Sam Randall was not bred a statesman, but he became one of four great parliamentary leaders by reason of his long service. Had John G. Carlisle been English born, he would have served in the House of Commons at the least 50 years. Gladstone was in the Commons 60 years. Had he been an American, it is doubtful if the whim of a single constituency would have allowed him 12 Congresses.

Matt Carpenter was a more powerful intellect than William B. Allison, but Allison exercised an infinitely more powerful influence on our parliamentary policies than Carpenter. One served less than 12 years, the other more than 30.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. LEA of California. Concerning the legislation of this session.

Mr. WALSH. Any particular legislation, or generally?

Mr. LEA of California. I did not want to confine it to one subject, but the high cost of living is the subject on which I desire to extend my remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman intend to devote any portion of it to the bonus legislation?

Mr. LEA of California. No.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 1024) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to John Zimmerman for certain lands in the Colorado National Forest upon the surrender of other lands of an equal acreage also located in the Colorado National Forest, Colorado.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 7158) to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING as the conferrees on the part of the Senate.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to state to my good friend from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] that the people of the United States just now are less concerned about the manner in which William G. McAdoo signed railroad orders when he was Director General than they are with regard to the kind of service they are going to get out of the railroads from now on. In other words, they are more concerned about railroad service in the future than they are with regard to water which has passed over the wheel already.

Do you know that in a large measure we are responsible for the poor railroad service now given the people? Do you know that there is not a single railroad in this land that can to-morrow discharge a shiftless, lazy, careless, inefficient employee and get away with it? A strike would occur tying up every railroad in the land. They have got to take just exactly what the railroad employees give them, and the people have to put up with it. Why, the expectation of a business man making a railroad connection is a dream of the past. Buy your ticket to St. Louis for connections out of there. Take the fast 4.50 Pennsylvania train that used to get you in there on the minute years ago or pay you back your money, and you will get into St. Louis to-morrow from three to six hours late, missing every connection. Who is to blame? The railroad crews who handle the trains are almost solely to blame. Do you know that trains get in and out of a station just as is willed by the crew in charge of the train?

Do you know that the Adamson law which you permitted to go on the statute books and which you on the other side of the aisle have still permitted to rest there ever since you have been in power in this House, places a premium on bad service, rewarding every member of the crew, fireman, engineer, mail clerk, conductor, and brakeman for getting in late and running the trains late? If they get into their destination 31 minutes late they get paid for a whole extra hour and they know it.

I was going to Texas last December. I was very much interested in this vital movement of the open shop because the open shop means the only kind of policy on God's green earth that gives every man a fair, square deal in this country. I was trying to get some of our Texas cities waked up on the open shop, cities like Houston, San Antonio, Austin, Fort Worth, Dallas, and Beaumont, and other cities, nearly every one of them now having live open-shop associations, to which cities they invite the laboring men of the United States to come, and it makes no difference whether they belong to an organization or not, they say "Come to our city and we will give you a fair, square deal."

I wanted to get to San Antonio on time, because I had every moment of my time mapped out to use to best advantage. I bought my reservations at Washington by the way of St. Louis, intending to catch one of the fast Texas trains, and in order to be sure I ordered reservations on three different trains out of St. Louis. I got in four and a half hours late and missed every one of them. [Laughter.] I finally got out of there on a slow train at 12 o'clock at night. I got down to Texarkana and I had a whole hour and a half there, waiting for them to make up the train.

Mr. WALSH. Did the train crew know that the gentleman was aboard? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I waited an hour and a half for them to make up the train. The time came for the train to leave, but not a single move had been made to start the train. I waited three-quarters of an hour past the train time. I then hunted the conductor up and said, "Look a here, what is the matter with this train? Why don't you get out? You are three-quarters of an hour late." He looked at me and said, "Oh, what is the hurry?" I said, "I want to get to San Antonio." And he said, "We have got to throw all that mail and baggage on." I said, "Why haven't you been doing that for the last hour and a half?" He said, "Oh, what is the hurry?" And I then winked at him and I called him to one side. You know you can do a whole lot with a wink, the same as a woman can. [Laughter.] I said, "Look a here. I want to be frank with you. I am from Washington and I am going to have to report on this very service when I get back to Washington and the kind of service you furnished with this train to San Antonio. The porter and the conductor back there in the sleeping car told me that for three months this train has never reached San Antonio on time. That it has been from four to five hours late every trip. I said I know it is all with you boys whether it gets in on time or not. I said I am going to tell Mr. Hines about this service when I get back and I am going to report on it." I did not tell him I was an inspector, because I was not, but he thought I was an inspector and I wanted him to think so [laughter], and he thought it. I said, "Now, what kind of a report are you going to cause me to make when I go back?" He said, "You go back and rest easy; we will get you in all right." He passed it down the line from division to division that there was a Washington inspector on board of that train. Every new crew that came aboard at every division knew that some one was on there looking out for the service, and the conductor worried the life out of me and my boy by coming back to the sleeper and reporting every little while on how he was making up time. [Laughter.]

Well, we got into San Antonio right on the dot. [Laughter.]

It demonstrated that it all depends on the train crew whether you get good service. Now, instead of you Republicans here bellyaching about Mr. McAdoo signing his name to orders, you get busy and let the superintendents of the Baltimore & Ohio, the Pennsylvania system, the New York Central, and other railroad systems of this country know that you are going to demand service of them, and if their train crews do not give good service we want them to discharge them, and we will back them up.

You had a chance to pass an antistrike measure that would have protected the country, but what did you do? You let our good friend from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] introduce what was known as the Anderson amendment, which was written and framed by the railroad brotherhoods of this country, every word of it, and you passed it without giving us a chance to debate it. When our good and great Democratic leader in this House, CLAUDE KITCHIN, asked you for a little time to debate it you would hardly let him open his mouth. You made us take it without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." That is the kind of service you fellows have given the American people; and it does not behoove you to get up here and talk about William G. McAdoo signing his name twice to a railroad order. Every one of you bankers in this House have signed your names to bank notes. I can probably find Brother FORDNEY'S name on more bank notes than anything else he has signed. Have not you signed them when you were in the banking business? Why, the bank cashiers have got their names on every little dollar bill and two dollar bill and five or ten or twenty dollar bill that comes out of the bank. It had to have Mr. McAdoo's name on it to make the railroad orders good. The people would not have paid attention to it if it had not had the Director General's name upon it. Now, what are you going to do? You can give good service to the country. Let us wake up, and when we get back here after the recess, after you have gone home and talked with your people and find out that they have been thinking and talking just about as you have heard BLANTON talk here on the floor of this House—after you come back let us pass an antistrike law, and the railroads will be all right and they will give us good service again.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to yield me three minutes more.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. KELLER. Is this speech made for campaign purposes, for campaign funds?

Mr. BLANTON. No; it is not a speech for campaign funds. But let me tell the gentleman something. I have had campaign funds offered me from Tampa, Fla., to Seattle, Wash., and do you know why? It is because I have been giving some service worth while to all the people of the United States, while you have been at home attending to private business. You can not get the campaign funds that I get because you have not been doing anything for the people of the country. I never used a dollar of campaign funds in my whole life until this campaign, but I am taking some now, and why? Because your labor unions are spending money in my district like water, and I want to tell you this: When I get through with my campaign and I get 15,000 majority, which I am going to get, all told I will not have expended $2,000 in my campaign. Now, do you want to ask me any more questions about campaign funds? [Laughter.] Maybe there is somebody else here who would like to bob up and ask me a question? Getting back to the question of the railroad service, let us come back here after the recess and protect this country from New York to the Gulf of Mexico with an antistrike clause that will prevent women and little children from being starved to death. Take the great southern port of Galveston. It is almost ruined to-day with a longshoremen's strike. Ships of the Mallory Line and of the Margan Line are changing their courses and are going to other ports to unload and take on cargo. A little bunch of longshoremen, just as there are here in the East, are absolutely ruining that port, and we sit here like a bunch of ninnies and have not the courage and the manhood to protect the business interests of this country. You vote with me when we get back here and we will stop this foolishness——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why do not those good folks down there protect those people?

Mr. BLANTON. With shotguns?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what it would take. It would take shotguns and pitchforks and trench knives and bombs to protect themselves against these striking thugs, who will not work themselves and will not let anybody else work. That is what it would take. Why does not the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] give them a law that will protect them? This is a law-abiding country. The gentleman is the chief lawmaker of this country. He has the lawmaking power in the hollow of his hand. Why do not you do something for the people of this country, instead of coming here almost daily and talking about how you are getting us out of debt at the rate of from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 a week on savings on estimates? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FAIRFIELD].

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think scarcely two weeks had elapsed after the assembling of this Congress before the Democratic papers throughout the country began to say that we had done nothing, and in a month, again and again from gentlemen on the Democratic side, not infrequently one would hear that we had done absolutely nothing. I do not question at all the veracity of the gentlemen who have again and again thus expressed themselves, for they are most estimable gentlemen.

But to one who has been unaccustomed to hear men in responsible positions talk that way, naturally the question arises as to whether it is a matter of crass ignorance or purposeful political capital. One is inclined, of course, to believe that we have not done everything that you gentlemen on the other side have asked us to do, many of those things, perhaps, that you did not really want us to do; but, after all, there has been a creditable showing, and one's mind naturally goes back over the political situation, and as a member of the Republican Party very naturally the thought came to me: Well, after all, what can you say and say truthfully in connection with the legislation of this Congress? I am one of those Republicans who as a part of the Republican Party believe still in the Constitution. The Republican Party believes in the Constitution. It still thinks that we have not outgrown the wisdom of the fathers. The three departments of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—ought to function. For several years the executive department has been dominating the legislative. The exigencies of war made necessary the further extension of executive power. This extension made the President of the United States the most autocratic ruler on the face of the earth. Congress gave evidence of its good faith in supporting the President by the granting of every power that he asked, by the appropriation of money without stint, and by the calling of the young manhood of the Nation without limit. There was no effort to interfere in any way with the direction or the use of materials and men for the winning of the war. The Congress reserved to itself only the constitutional right to impeach.

The levying of taxes to carry on these expenditures was in the hands of a Democratic administration. They controlled the Senate and the House and had the President and officers subordinate to him for the execution of these laws. The Democratic Party levied the war taxes for the fiscal years of 1918, 1919, and 1920. Notwithstanding the excessive levying, the expenditures have been far in excess of the income. Three billions of dollars in short-time loans, maturing with deadly certainty, only to be reissued, has been the policy by which the Democratic administration has pushed forward what it has expended in excess of what it has collected. So that to-day we face a current expenditure of six billions and a hang-over of three billions. Now, our Democratic friends are crying out: "Reduce the taxes in order that the people may be satisfied and pay the obligations in order that the Nation's honor may be protected."

By verdict of the people, on November 7, 1918, the Republican Party was given absolute control in the lower House and nominal control only in the Senate. The Democratic Congress continued until the 4th of March, 1919. Up to that day, March 4, 1919, every department of the Government was in absolute control of the Democratic Party. In early December, 1919, the President left for Europe. He knew, and all public men and most private citizens in this country knew, that the Constitution gave the Senate equal power in the making of treaties. It expressly says that the President "shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur." He did not take the advice of the Senate, not even of the Senators of his own party. Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, was at that time chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and a Democrat. In an address in Omaha, Nebr., April 19 of this year, he said:

I became chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the Senate when the Democrats controlled the Senate. Before the President left the United States to go to Paris he did not call me into consultation any more than he did any other Senator, although I was still chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and had not been superseded by Senator LODGE.

In the same address he said:

Of course, Woodrow Wilson made mistakes. He made a mistake when he proceeded to negotiate a treaty of peace without taking a few leading Members of the Senate into his confidence.

Just before the President left he had asked for a vote of confidence in him personally, and the American people had replied by voting a want of confidence and returning a large Republican majority to the lower House.

Just before sailing and after the war was over, after the fighting was done, when there was no reason save a political one, through his Postmaster General he seized the cables to every country in the world and kept Europe uninformed as to the situation in America, and kept us ignorant of what was common knowledge on the Continent of Europe, by such a censorship of news concerning the progress of the Paris conference as has never been exercised by any autocrat in the world. Thus he went upon his self-appointed mission.

The men whom he chose to go with him in no sense fully represented the people of this great country. They were very excellent gentlemen, willing to subordinate themselves, however, to whatever the President might propose. He held them so utterly incapable that the one man among them fitted above all others for taking a useful part in the negotiations stated upon the witness stand before a congressional committee that he was kept in utter ignorance of all the essential features until they had been passed upon. He further stated upon the witness stand that if the American people knew what was in the treaty they would never ratify it.

The President was in Europe for eight months. The Democratic Congress, which ended March 4, 1919, had failed to make the appropriations necessary to conduct the Government for the fiscal year 1920. The Republican Congress could not constitutionally meet until December 1920. The President, therefore, was under the necessity of calling an extra session. This extra session began May 19. This new Congress was Republican. Its first work was to provide the means for carrying on the ordinary work of the Government. The fiscal year expired June 30. It had but six weeks to review all the appropriation bills that had failed of passage through the incapacity of the preceding Democratic Congress. Yet in that six weeks it made a reduction in those bills of $800,000,000.

It addressed itself immediately to finding out how the money collected for the war had been expended. There was, of course, necessary waste and extravagance in the prosecution of a war, but such appalling waste and such appalling extravagance has never been equaled in any country or in any age. There was waste and extravagance and hoarding in vast quantities of foodstuffs. And that was still going on six months after the armistice had been signed. There was vast waste and extravagance in the building of the cantonments, fully known to every carpenter and plumber and water boy that worked upon them. There was vast waste and extravagance in the buying of materials, from safety razors to limousines for the officers through all the list of trucks and Fords. The airplane industry alone netted a loss of a billion dollars.

The Government found itself at the time the armistice was declared in the possession of a great quantity of material which it has not wisely conserved. I do not question the constitutional right of President Wilson going in person to Paris, but that at the time when the country needed an Executive to salvage what might be possible out of the waste of war, it was nothing short of the highest unwisdom for the Chief Executive to be absent from this country eight months.

There have been three distinct attitudes of mind among the people on this League of Nations; first, for the league before they knew what was in it; second, in doubt when the mandates were understood; third, for it with safe-guarding reservations. It was heralded as a panacea for all wars. There was to be ushered in the golden age of peace on earth, good will toward men; but, unlike that golden age which the Master would bring to the world, it was to be secured not by putting into the minds and hearts of men everywhere the principles of righteousness, justice, and mercy, but it was to come down by dictation by a few great powers that undertook to settle the distribution of territory among themselves and then to force all the nations of the world into a league of nations to preserve forevermore that distribution. So Africa was to be divided among three nations—Italy, England, and France. Asia was to be parceled out to Great Britain and Japan. The islands of the seas were assigned to their respective masters. The world was to be placed in a strait-jacket and all movements toward liberty by any people anywhere were to be determined by the imperial government to whom their people had been assigned. No other interpretation of the League of Nations is possible when it is remembered that under article 10 the high contracting powers agree to most solemnly protect the territorial integrity of every nation signatory to the league.

At first thought the whole American people were favorable to a league of nations, and, without knowledge, assuming that the league born of the deliberations at Paris would meet their approval. This attitude of mind grew out of a sincere desire of every humane man that reason and conscience might control the destinies of the world. So long as the masses were not thinking as to what was in the treaty and the league, but intent only on what its authors insisted it would do for them, they were for it. A closer view revealed, however, that in the making of the treaty the secret conferences entered into between Italy, Japan, England, and France had displaced the 14 points advocated by President Wilson, and that the league had its birth in the nations given to secret diplomacy. It is clear to any thoughtful man that the terms of the treaty were determined by lust of power and extension of territory; that hate and avarice and malice and unholy ambition and cold, calculating diplomacy of the old school sought to give to the victors all the spoils of war and assigned the mandatories to the nations which could exploit them best in their own interest.

When the subject of mandatories was examined it was found that the United States was expected to take over Armenia and Turkey. In harmony with that plan, the administration, through its pacifist Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker, recommended the organizing of a standing Army of 576,000 men, four times as big as our standing Army was before the war. One of the leading generals of the Army, when questioned as to the need of an Army of that size, said very frankly that it would require 200,000 men in Europe to take care of our obligations under the treaty. When it is remembered that the President of the United States under the Constitution is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and can order them anywhere at any time when he thinks it necessary for the preservation of the rights of the American people, it begins to be understood by the American people that should we ratify the treaty without reservations the American Army could be ordered to Turkey, Armenia, Russia, or any part of the Balkans, to Asia or Africa, to any place on the face of the earth where the President thought we were morally obligated to send them. This is not an unusual interpretation of his power. President Wilson himself has sent the Army into Haiti, into Santo Domingo. He landed troops at Vera Cruz and made war on Mexico, with whom we were at peace. He sent the Army after Villa. He sent a contingent against Russia. I am not now discussing the wisdom or unwisdom of these acts of the President, but only call attention to the fact that he has the power and exercises it.

I doubt not that the effort of this administration to secure a standing Army of 576,000 men had for its purpose a large contingent to be used in the settlement of the difficulties in Europe, Asia, and Africa. The Congress of the United States believes that in matters concerning the territorial integrity of the nations, the dissensions and squabbles and insurrections and revolutions of the Balkans and other peoples, there should be some limits placed on the power of the President if we should enter the League of Nations.

That is the only contention between the Senate and the President concerning article 10. He wants the power on his own mere motion to determine when and how and where the Army and Navy of the United States shall be used in the maintaining of world peace by force of arms, and not by a moral power. There can be no other interpretation of his statement that the reservation to article 10 which expressly provides that the Army and Navy shall not be used in foreign wars or in foreign countries under the League of Nations except by the express approval of Congress will take the heart out of the treaty.

This Nation is too big to be run by one man, however great or good he may be. The Diety alone possesses such all wisdom, all power, and all goodness. The President is not yet all wise, for he did not see that the gulf current of events was inevitably bearing us on toward war in 1916. He is not all good, for he refuses to receive any advice from a coordinate power of the Government whose constitutional rights are as sacred as his own. He is not all powerful, for a majority of the Senate will not consent that he usurp the powers of that body and take the destinies of the Nation into his own hands.

The President was in Europe eight months. He returned to find that the Senate still held to the Constitution and insisted on its constitutional rights; that the people still believed that the Declaration of Independence was intended to secure the people of this country their own freedom from force both within and without. He found that the Senate still believed that the wisdom of the fathers has not been outgrown. Obsessed by the idea of his own greatness, intoxicated by the air of sycophancy and subserviency which he breathes from his own satellites who are themselves obsessed by the idea that the king can do no wrong, he appealed to the people to compel the Senate to surrender its reason, its conscience, its constitutional duties to his autocratic will.

Unfortunately for him, and grieviously unfortunate for the country at large, he broke in health and since then has been unable to perform his duties under the Constitution.

For seven months the Government of the United States has had no efficient Executive. I speak advisedly. Senator HITCHCOCK, leader for President Wilson, in his effort to ratify the treaty, speaking at Omaha, Nebr., April 19, 1920, says:

> To-day the President is an invalid, broken in health, depressed in spirit, and bitterly disappointed at the failure of the United States Senate to permit the United States to enter the League of Nations. Since last September, when he broke down, he has known nothing but weakness and weariness and pain.

No man having the common instincts of humanity can but deplore this unofrtunate condition physically and mentally to which the President has been brought. But so vast, so important, so vital to the Republic are these mighty issues that the facts in all their glaring inconsistency must be placed before the people of this great country. When this has been done fully, I have no doubt that the American people will thank God again that through the wise restraint put upon the President by the framers of the Constitution the Republic has been saved from unreservedly placing its stamp of approval upon all the iniquities that may be in the treaty of peace.

It would seem that at the close of the Great War the Executive of a hundred and ten millions of people might have found it within the province of his duties to look after the interests of his own people in those things which he alone under the Constitution has the power to direct. And while thus looking after the needs of the Republic he might have been able to find some man, at least in his own party, to whom he could have intrusted the diplomatic mission that kept him away from his duties at a critical time for months, and when we add to this fact that on his return he gave his whole attention to the same subject until he broke in health in September, and that since that time he has known only "weakness and weariness and pain," then we can begin to understand that the Government of the United States has been without a Chief Executive since December, 1919, when he sailed away and transplanted the seat of government to Paris, France.

Domestic questions have arisen, questions of finance, of industry, of taxes, of immigration, of social unrest, repeal of war-time legislation, of the return of the railroads to their owners, of the return of the wires and the telephones and cables to private control. The Republican Congress addressed itself first to the cutting down of appropriations in the sum of $800,000,000 for 1920. It has reduced the demands of the executive departments for appropriations in 1921, $1,200,000,000. Thus already it has refused appropriations to the Government in the amount of $2,000,000,000 that a Democratic Congress would have appropriated. The reduction of the clerical force of the Government has been undertaken and great numbers have been taken off the pay rolls. However, the President is the head of the executive departments. It was his duty to see to it that there was as rapid reductions in the number of clerks in each department as was consistent with the efficient conduct of the business of the Government. He has lent no assistance in this matter. The heads of every department and bureau and extra organization taken on during the war have fought every attempt to reduce the clerical force. The Republicans at times have had to cut blindly, and yet they have been anxious to do the right thing and give the Government the money that is absolutely needed to clean up its war work and run the necessary departments with efficiency.

The Republican Party has revealed extravagance and waste, and discovered evidences of fraud that further savings might be secured. Its committees have put into the hands of the Department of Justice facts upon which prosecutions may be entered and convictions secured connected with the building of the cantonments, shipbuilding, and vast expenditures in many lines. The Department of Justice has had ample funds allotted to it for the enforcement of the laws against profiteering and hoarding. Congress has done all that it could do, but it was discovered that the Government itself was the principal hoarder of foodstuffs and various manufactured articles, and that the Government itself had entered into an agreement with manufacturers and wholesalers of foodstuffs not to place the Government surplus upon the market; the Government itself is a party and has been continuously a party to the continued high cost of living.

There is a storm in finance, in industry, in social unrest. Its center is in Europe. Its causes are foreign. Many of them can not be reached by legislation; work, and more work, alone can reduce the high cost of living. Production and greater production alone will relieve the necessities of the poor.

The Congress is not an executive. It can not enforce the laws; it can only make them. The President, and he alone, through the various executive departments, is the one who can reduce the high cost of living, if it can be reduced by governmental action. I do not say that it can so be reduced, but at any rate the responsibility is with the Executive and not with Congress. There is ample power to do all that may be done already granted to the President and his subordinates.

"Why does not Congress do something?" many ask. This is a pertinent question. Just as pertinent is the question, "What more can it do than has been done?" Congress is not responsible for the causes of economic, social, or industrial unrest. These causes are the natural laws, social and economic, laws of supply and demand, which legislation can not control and which every effort to control has resulted in failure. It is the function of Congress, which is the crew of the ship of state, to steer the ship and keep it off the rocks. It is the province of Congress to see to it that the ship keeps true to her course. It is not the province of Congress to quell the storm. It is not within the province of Congress to say, "Peace, be still," when the elements are at war. It is the function of those who have in charge the ship freighted with a hundred and ten millions of people to see to it that she does not founder in the sea of socialism; that she does not go to pieces upon the rocks of anarchy and bolshevism or enter into an unknown sea without chart and no signal lights along the shore. We have a captain who has been attempting to sail the ship by the light of his own genius and not by the fixed stars. The chief mate, the Secretary of State, Mr. Lansing, did not agree with him. The captain has been sick for seven months and confined to his stateroom. His chief mate took the liberty to hold a council. The captain dismissed him.

The Government was losing a million dollars a day by Government operation of the railroads. This was not due to the increase in wages for the railway employees, for their wages were not increased unduly or in the same proportion as the wages in other industries. It was due to the inefficiency in Government management. The new railroad legislation for the first time in the history of this country fully recognizes the rights of labor, of the people, and of the railroad owners by giving each of the three interested parties equal representation on a permanent board for the adjustment of grievances. That legislation will receive the approval of the people of this country and will be finally recognized by the railroad workers themselves as eminently fair and for their own best interests.

Ample provision has been made for the rehabilitation of our wounded soldiers. Congress has done its full duty in their interest. If there is cause for complaint the responsibility is with the department organized under the direction of the President for carrying out the law of Congress. Adequate provision is being made for compensation to all the soldiers of the late war. This measure is not partisan in any sense, for Democrats and Republicans alike are anxious to do the right thing by the boys.

The Constitution of the United States was adopted 133 years ago for a people three and one-half millions in number and occupying only a narrow fringe along the Atlantic seaboard. It is now the basic law for one hundred and ten millions of people, covering a continent in area. This Government is unique in development. There has come to be known in the world the term "Americanism." It was essentially a new government, differing in character from any then known in the world. Our fathers presented their grievances against usurpation, their protests against tyranny, and their basic form of government in such a wise, efficient, and practical way that their state papers are the classics of the ages on free government and the hope of every people struggling toward liberty. By following the course which they followed, by heeding the admonitions of those who fought for our liberty, who framed our Constitution, and who set up our form of government, this country has had an unparalleled career of happiness and prosperity.

The Republican Party came into being to preserve the Union that had been handed down to us from the fathers. For 50 years it controlled the destiny of this Nation by a wise adherence to those sane and conservative and proved principles that had given birth to the Nation. The Republican Party believes in the Declaration of Independence, in the Constitution of the United States, in the wisdom of the judicial decisions of John Marshall, in the wise argumentation of Webster, and in the wisdom and patience and self-sacrifice of the immortal Lincoln.

Following this course through the years, this country has become not only the mightiest physical power in the world but its greatest moral power. We have been great by example, not by dictation to other people. We are willing to take our just share in the responsibility of the world, but we are not willing to try to be the arbiter of the destiny of every other nation. Asking neither glory nor honor nor fame nor indemnity nor territorial expansion, we entered the Great War in defense of our own rights that had been violated by reason of causes for which we were not responsible. The Republican Party wants no great standing Army of 576,000 men that at the will of the President may be projected into any European quarrel. The Republican Party will provide for an Army of 175,000 men, which will adequately answer all domestic problems and take care of any sudden emergency that may arise.

The program of the Republican Party is saving wherever possible, constructive legislation in harmony with the Constitution to take care of all new and vital questions that may arise, the restoration of the ordinary functions of government by the repeal of war-time legislation. That can not be fully accomplished until the Republican Party has been given complete control of the Government. With a sick President, bent on having his own way, contrary to the judgment of a majority of the people of this country, it is impossible to realize the full measure of that program thus outlined until after March 4, 1921. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a few weeks ago I received a letter from one of my constituents, who asked, "What is the matter with the present Congress? Is it going to put the farmer out of business?"

I might merely have replied to the effect that the Republican Party is in absolute control of this Congress. The Republican majority in the House of Representatives is almost 50. In the Senate the Republican majority, while small, was made safe through the purchase of one seat. I might have stated this and stopped. But, actuated by a desire to get at all the facts in the case, and knowing my correspondent to be a farmer and stockman who has carefully followed the proceedings of this and other Congresses, his questions were counted worthy of more than cursory consideration. Other letters along similar lines further influenced me, in this day of investigations, to begin a one-man investigation. This investigation, differing greatly from many authorized by Congress, inasmuch as it was conducted without cost to the country, has been concluded. To-day in the time allotted me and having replied to my constituent, I wish now to report to the Congress.

Permit me first to state, if you please, that having been born and reared on a farm, having come of an unbroken—but sometimes "near broke"—line of farmers, and having devoted my life thus far to the cause of agriculture, I can in truth say that I know the American farmer. I know him as one knows the members of his own family. My knowledge of him is such as comes of sympathy and understanding. His problems are my problems and the problems of my people.

The farmer is no fool. While looking for results he will not be satisfied with rhetoric. He is a judge of measures and of men, and next November, I suspect, many a politician will learn that the telephone girl is not the only human who has "got his number." Busy in the field, the farmer has not devoted much time to the forum, yet as his hands have been employed so has his head. He has watched while he worked. He has been doing his own thinking in his own way. With a mind that is clear and living a life that is clean, he is capable of arriving at conclusions that are correct. Seldom does he mistake the shadow for the substance or confuse promises with performances. He distinguishes between friend and foe and between politics and patriotism.

So to-day when from farmers in every section of the country there come appeals and prayers, when men who throughout our Nation's history have quietly and unassumingly rendered signal and unselfish service while the more garrulous, and frequently the more greedy, have secured recognition, ask "What is the matter with Congress?" well may we pause to answer. Dare we do less? Dare we fail to do more?

Legislation may have a more direct effect upon farm profits and losses than does the use of clover, stable manure, or lime upon the land. So the farmer is concerned with what Congress does for him—or, sometimes, to him. Conscious of this truth, I have given considerable time to searching out those congressional acts which have a direct bearing upon agriculture. The result of my labors has served to call to mind one of the most interesting stories contained in the Bible, the greatest agricultural textbook ever written, and to further stress the significance of the numeral 7 as it appears in history, profane and sacred.

In the forty-first chapter of Genesis we read of Pharaoh's dream and its interpretation, of the "seven kine, well favored and fat fleshed that fed in the meadow," and of "seven ears of corn upon one stalk, rank and good." "And behold there came seven years of great plenty throughout all the land."

Mr. Chairman, in considering agricultural legislation my attention has been directed to another seven-year period of great plenty. Having in mind this period, Secretary of Agriculture Edwin T. Meredith recently said, "More has been accomplished in aid of American agriculture during the past seven years than in all the previous history of the Government." That is a broad statement, but it is true. The greater part of all the legislation now on the statute books of the United States which has for its purpose the development and aid of agriculture has been enacted within the past seven years.

Now, it is interesting to note that these seven good legislative years, years of the well-favored kine and the seven ears of corn upon one stalk, years of farm fatness, were also Democratic years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Eight years ago a Democrat, Woodrow Wilson, was elected President. Until one year ago he had cooperating with him a Democratic Congress. Under these conditions it is not surprising to note the passage of many acts favorable to the farmer and incidentally to all. I say all, for when ill fares the producer, the worker in the field, soon must suffer the consumer, the toiler in the factory. I repeat that it is not a matter of surprise to find the Democratic Party actively engaged in promoting a great constructive program in the cause of agriculture. It is no more to be marveled at than that good seed falling in good soil should bring forth a bountiful harvest.

The Democratic Party, true to tradition and to the principle that parties like plants must draw their strength from below rather than from above, has throughout its history fought the battles of the farmer. It was under a Democratic administration, that of Grover Cleveland, that the farmers of the United States were first given representation in the President's Cabinet, the first Secretary of Agriculture being Norman J. Colman, of Missouri. The creation of this place in the Cabinet, while proving Democracy's interest in the producer, is, in effect, of secondary importance to the benefits resulting from the many agricultural acts written into the national statutes during the recent seven-year period.

Strenuous as is the life of the farmer, perplexing as are his problems, and hard as is his fight—and I dare anyone deny that conditions in the country are now extremely critical—the struggle would to-day be more unequal and more discouraging but for the passage of some of the friendly and helpful legislation of the seven good years.

Let us here hastily consider some of this legislation, all of which was enacted by Democratic Congresses and approved by a Democratic President.

For many years the American farmer, while offering the best security known, was paying the highest rate of interest of any class of borrowers. To-day, when practically everything is higher in price, the farmer is able as a result of the passage of the Federal farm loan act to borrow money at a 5½ per cent interest rate without commission and without the necessity of having to renew his loan every few years with its accompanying uncertainties and costs. Through the working of this law, the act being approved July 17, 1916, one of the chief handicaps of agriculture has been removed.

Not only does the farmer secure money on the most favorable terms, but it is his own institution from which he is borrowing. This institution is largely managed by himself and for its stability he is personally responsible. This increases his self-respect, gives him valuable experience in cooperating with his neighbors, and at the same time greatly helps him in the conduct of his business.

May I say here that the greatest need of agriculture is agricultural leaders. If the farmer is ever going to be uplifted it will be by the men who actually do the work of feeding the world.

Since the passage of the farm loan act $344,721,366 has been loaned to 124,492 farmers through the national farm loan associations and the Federal land banks. During April an aggregate of $2,078,675 was loaned to 513 farmers of the United States. Loans totaling $79,259,971 have also been made through the joint-stock land banks, another character of institution provided in the law.

Large as are the benefits which have come through direct borrowing under the farm loan act, perhaps larger benefits resulting through the indirect influence of this act have come to borrowers patronizing land mortgage banks and other institutions which lowered their rates as a result of the rate provided through the farm loan act. The lower interest rates thus provided have made it possible for a larger number of producers to stay on the farms at a time when production has been paramount to all other problems. So the consumer has been benefited. Had the farmer been compelled to pay the old interest rates of 8 and 10 per cent, food, if it could have been produced in quantities sufficient to meet the demand, must have been practically prohibitive in price.

Another act of far-reaching importance and one which has served the Nation so admirably in these years of financial test and disturbance is the Federal reserve act of December 23, 1913.

In addition to providing a system of currency free from the domination of big business and directly benefiting all the people, provision is made under section 13 of this act whereby for the first time farm paper with six months' maturity becomes satisfactory collateral in the channels of finance. Only the imagination can measure the benefits of this section of the reserve act to the farmers of this country. It is a recognition long due the farmer and far too long deferred.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will it disturb the gentleman if I ask a question?

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. No, sir.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would like to have the gentleman's idea of the joint-stock land bank. I want to state to the gentleman it is a Democratic measure and has brought down the rate of interest in my State of Texas from 10 to 5½ per cent to the farmer and stock raiser.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Answering the gentleman, I might say that the loans coming through this particular act have amounted to $79,000,000 since the passage of the law.

As everyone familiar with the subject knows, the farmer is a heavy borrower for current expenses. It frequently happens that the local banks are unable fully to meet his demands when the crop season opens or when he is feeding or grazing cattle heavily. Through the Federal reserve bank, which came into being in the period of the seven good years, years of the well-favored kine, and the seven years of corn upon one stalk, the local banks can rediscount the farmer's paper and accommodate him without difficulty and without excessive costs.

Especially has the Federal reserve banking system been helpful to the cattle interests, which before the establishment of the Federal reserve bank were without adquate financial support, and every few years were forced to refinance, often at great loss, and always with uncertainty and expense.

Heavy as have been the losses sustained by live-stock feeders during the last few months, these losses would have been greater but for the limited relief afforded through the Federal reserve act.

The farmer is also interested in that feature of the Federal reserve act which authorizes national banks to lend money on farm mortgages.

That the farmer must be afforded still further relief as a matter of justice, and in order to enable him to feed his fellows, is a fact that some future Congress, more friendly to the farmer than is this body, is sure to concede. In the meantime former Congresses are to be congratulated.

Referring again to the Federal reserve act, when we couple with it the proper utilization of the Federal warehouse act we at once recognize a measure of far-reaching possibilities in production and marketing. Under the Federal warehouse act there is proposed a system of Federally regulated warehouses for agricultural products issuing uniform warehouse receipts. These receipts, when issued by a licensed warehouse company on standard farm products, are like meal in the bin or money in the bank.

The cotton-futures act, which is the first successful attempt to regulate the operations of futures exchanges and which has enhanced the value of cotton to the grower, the man entitled to the returns, represents other forward-looking legislation.

Early in the period of the seven good years, years of the well-favored kine and the seven ears of corn upon one stalk, rank and good, came the passage of the agricultural cooperative extension act of May 8, 1914. This act, frequently referred to as the Smith-Lever Act, represents the most important movement ever attempted in direct popular education along a given line. Providing as it does a method of itinerant agricultural teaching of home economics and agriculture, it is perhaps not too much to say of the Smith-Lever Act that it is the greatest single contribution to the cause of farming anywhere in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The amount of money now available for extension work will be increased from year to year until it reaches its full development in 1922–23. At that time the Federal Government alone will appropriate $4,500,000, which, with the States matching all amounts above $10,000 a year each, will make available through this single source $8,680,000 a year.

Designed to help solve the problems of the farm as they developed in peace times, the Smith-Lever Act yet proved the most effective piece of war machinery in the entire Government when America threw her strength into the great struggle. Three days after war was declared Hon. David F. Houston, then Secretary of Agriculture and a Missourian, participated in a great conference in St. Louis, where there was worked out a far-reaching program of food production and conservation. So under this act, which represented agricultural preparedness, there were mobilized the tremendous resources which in the months that followed made of the farmer an effective fighting force second only to that on the front.

But it is not sufficient that it be made easier for the farmer to finance his business, and that the best agricultural information, the result of the experiences of the practical farmer and the findings of the scientist, be made available. There are other problems, including those of marketing and transportation.

The Bureau of Markets, created in 1913 as the Office of Markets and Rural Organizations, had by 1917 grown to such proportions that it was designated as the Bureau of Markets. This bureau provides an agency for furnishing information as to crop movements and prices. While designed primarily for the consumer, this bureau confers benefits directly upon the producers.

The ship-purchase act, a measure necessary to the commerce of the country and of prime importance to agriculture as well, and the marine-insurance act, which under war conditions was necessary to insure transportation of farm products, both represent legislation directly affecting the farmer.

The progressive income tax and the progressive inheritance tax are other measures designed to place the burden of taxation upon those most able to pay. It has been held that it is only proper that great wealth should meet its due obligation in the matter of taxes. Immense fortunes are not found among rural folk. No farmer made a fortune out of the war. In the country we find practically no millionaires, no mendicants, just men.

Lastly, in referring to the legislative acts of the seven good years, I mention the Federal aid road act approved July 11, 1916, and amended February 28, 1919. When we bear in mind how the highways offer infinite possibilities of local communication while linking together widely separated farms and cities, when we think of the hundreds of thousands of miles of roadway in the United States, and when we pause to consider that the highways in truth represent the arteries of trade through which flows the rich red blood of commerce, when it is known that every bushel of grain and every pound of beef and pork must pass over a country road before it reaches the consumer in the city, we better appreciate the meaning of the Federal aid road act.

Think of what it means. It appropriates from the Federal Treasury, to be expended in cooperation with the States in the construction and improvement of rural post roads, a total of $75,000,000. Just as truly does it influence the development of road building along right lines, promote a fuller and more attractive rural life, and add to the happiness and well-being of all the people. It also helps lighten one of the heaviest taxes the farmer pays and from which he receives no protection—the mud tax.

Does anybody believe that with such a record, covering a period of years when Democrats were in power, there would at its completion come the question, "What is the matter with Congress? Is it trying to put the farmer out of business?" Of course not. Nor was such a question asked—not then.

Turning again to the forty-first chapter of Genesis, we read of seven other kine, "ill-favored and lean fleshed," and of seven ears of corn, thin, empty, and blasted with the east wind. And we are told that when the seven good years were past famine followed.

Changes come, changes not alone in cattle and in corn but in Congresses.

In November, 1918, the country, impressed with the promises freely made in many districts that a Republican Congress would support the President, and, ignoring politics but prompted by the loftiest of patriotism, would intelligently and earnestly seek to solve the after-war problems, placed the Republican Party in power.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. DAVEY. The gentleman does not believe, I am sure, that the people are going to accept and welcome seven Republican famine years?

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. I think we will get our answer, and it will be satisfactory, next November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, on May 19, 1919, the new Congress convened. With the reorganization of the House of Representatives there came many changes. The Speakership, long held by the beloved CHAMP CLARK, passed from Missouri to Massachusetts, from the great corn-belt country with its farms to New England with her factories. Complete were the changes made in committee chairmen. Agriculture, charged with having received more than its just deserts under Democrats, was disciplined. While Maine and Massachusetts were each given three committee chairmanships, such agricultural States as Missouri, with 155,000,000 bushels of corn and 57,000,000 bushels of wheat to her credit in 1919; Oklahoma, with 74,000,000 bushels of corn, 52,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 930,000 bales of cotton; and Texas, with 202,000,000 bushels of corn, 31,000,000 bushels of wheat, and 2,700,000 bales of cotton [applause] are unrepresented at the head of any committee in the present Congress. Vermont, a pygmy State in agricultural production, is given a committee chairmanship, but not so Virginia, land of corn and cotton. So might we continue as to committee chairmen.

Time forbids an analysis of the membership of the many committees. We may, though, pause to inquire as to how fares the farmer in that master committee—or should we say "his-master's-voice-committee"—the steering committee? Surely, on this committee we shall find farmers—"horny-handed sons of toil"—or if not, then those whose training and environment have been such as to enlist their every sympathy with the man who struggles to wrest a living from the land. Unfortunately, I do not find in the Congressional Directory official information concerning this committee. In lieu of this, I turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 22, 1920, and to page 5997. Here, in the report of a speech by Representative HENRY T. RAINEY, there appear the names of four Members of this House declared to constitute the steering committee, and whose respective home addresses are Chicago, Cincinnati, Rochester, N. Y., and Worcester, Mass. After calling this roll, to which no farmer or near farmer could answer, Mr. RAINEY said: "These gentlemen whose names I have read are reputed to be millionaires, every one of them, and they have never been heard to deny it." So the farmer, whose work places him in closest partnership with the Master of the Vineyard, is unrepresented on the master committee of this Congress.

And, again, I want to say in the country you will find no millionaires, few mendicants—just men.

But let us look to legislation, let us review the work of this body during the last 12 months. As our inquiry is one concerning agriculture, we turn to the Agricultural appropriation bill. What do we find? What does the debate, continuing over several days, disclose?

Strange as it may seem, and at a time when farmers are engaged in a supreme struggle against discouraging odds, a constant fight, directed by Members on the Republican side of this Chamber, was waged to prevent any increase, and in various instances to force a reduction in, this bill, which carried a little more than $30,000,000, only two-thirds of which is for agriculture proper, and at a time when appropriations made and expenditures authorized by this Congress will total more than four thousand million dollars.

But let us not deal in generalities. Who, when the bill was under consideration, fought the farmer? For answer, read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Do so, and you will find where a Member on the majority side of this Chamber offered an amendment to cut $100,000 from the appropriation for hog-cholera control, notwithstanding it is estimated that the loss from this disease in the year ending May 1, 1919, amounted to 2,800,000 head of hogs, worth twice the entire amount carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill. The amendment, which was adopted over the protest of Democratic Members, was voted on in the House February 14, at which time 164 Members voted for it. Of these there were but 8 Democrats.

We lead the world in number and value of registered and pure-bred animals, more than 60 pure breeds of live stock being found in the United States. Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay, and other South American countries are, or soon will be, actively in the market for breeding stock. With this thought in view, a representative was last year sent by the Bureau of Markets to South America to look into conditions. This man, a practical farmer and extensive breeder of live stock, reported and recommended that special live-stock representatives be placed in South America to assist in turning trade to the live-stock breeders of the United States, as England now has her representatives on the ground. Strange as it may seem, the proposed appropriation, amounting to but $25,000, was stricken from the bill on a point of order made by a Republican Member.

Again, during the consideration of the Agricultural bill, a Republican Member from New York offered an amendment to take $500,000 from the cooperative agricultural extension work. In contrast, we find Mr. RUBEY, Democrat, of Missouri, making a fight for an appropriation for $300,000 to provide means to protect the corn crop of the United States, worth $3,934,000,000, from the European corn borer, which threatens to cause losses amounting to millions. On the roll call by which this amendment was defeated in the House, after being adopted in committee, practically the entire support came from the Democratic membership. In fact, as the records show, during all the time this bill, which more than any other affects the farmer, was being considered by this body, Members of the majority party were constantly engaged in an effort to reduce the appropriation or to prevent increases, however worthy.

Mr. Chairman, a few months ago, while speaking on the Agricultural appropriation bill, then before Congress, I took occasion to express my approval of an investigation made by Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Blakslee. Thousands of farmers reported a great shortage of help, with consequent increased cost of production and with greatly decreased acreages. This information, which was given wide publicity, opened the eyes of a lot of city people who needed to have their eyes opened. I feel that Mr. Blakslee rendered a great service to the farmer and to the entire country, yet I find him criticized. I can not understand it. I can no more understand it than I can understand why on February 13 an amendment to increase by less than $5,000 an appropriation to provide for the better distribution of agricultural food products was so vigorously opposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and who during the debate was referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] as "the leader of the steering committee on the majority side and * * * who is always loud in his opposition to anything of interest to the farmer."

I can not understand why the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], chairman of the Republican congressional committee, should on February 19, 1919, have spoken at length in an effort to strike from a bill a provision relating to organizations of farmers.

While the congressional legislative mill has ground out about the usual amount of grist, some of it designed to fatten special interests at the expense of the farmer, not one big constructive measure to aid agriculture has been written to the credit of this Congress. While the farmer is calling for laborers to till acres which otherwise must remain idle, Congress has through legislation made it more difficult for him to secure the help he must have if we are to avert world hunger. Because the ground does not plow itself, because the seed of the plants upon which we depend for food or clothing are not self-sown, because corn and cotton can not be cultivated by the magic waving of a wand, because wheat and a hundred other crops can not be humanized and cafeteriaized, there comes from the country the Macedonian cry for help—first of all, help in the form of workers, help through legislation which will guarantee to the farmer that he will not be less favored than are men in other callings.

This Congress passed the railroad bill which guarantees the roads a profit, but there is no such provision for the farmer. Instead, Congress has refused to provide adequate appropriations for the continued improvement of the great inland waterways of the country which, if given deserved support, will become carriers of an ever-increasing amount of farm produce and at reduced rates.

As the result of an investigation which President Wilson ordered made by the Federal Trade Commission, and also an investigation made by the Bureau of Markets under authority granted by the food-control act of 1917, startling disclosures as to the immense profits and indefensible practices of the big meat packers have been made during the last year. Yet a year and a day after this Congress convened, we find Senator KENYON complaining that the packers' bill has been given no place by the steering committee and hear him making a plea for a "square test on whether the packers' bill is to have any consideration at this session of the Senate." In the House, after extensive hearings have been had before the Agricultural Committee, no bill to curb the packers, who have not only been skinning cattle but "skinning" producer and consumer, has yet been reported for passage.

While it is true that not until the passage of needed legislation, including the food-control act which gave to a branch of the Department of Agriculture power to go into the market and make a close-up study of conditions, were there provisions for securing such evidence as has been recently made available, the question has heretofore claimed the attention of Congress. As long ago as 1888, Senator George G. Vest, the beloved "Little Giant," at one time a citizen of the district I now represent, was made chairman of a committee to investigate the question of the transportation and sale of meat products. In its report, this committee referred to "an abnormal and ruinous centralization of the cattle market and its domination by a few men and railroad corporations."

To-day, with the cost of pork production practically doubled, largely because gamblers and speculators have been playing with corn, just as a cat plays with a mouse, hogs are selling at six to seven dollars a hundredweight less than when this Congress convened, while the slump in cattle prices amounts to from 30 to 40 per cent. This condition means ruin and failure for thousands of farmers and feeders.

I quote from a recent letter written by one who is connected with the Missouri Agricultural Experiment Station.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The slump in feeder cattle now is over 100 per cent, I would like to state to my friend.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. I think that is true. I am referring to cattle finished for market.

He says, "Our cattle will go to market within the next 10 days; they are good cattle, have been fed sufficient rations, and have made satisfactory gains. They will lose between $12 and $35 a head. It may be argued that the State is in a better shape to lose than are some others, but it is not a very satisfactory situation to face. You can announce to Congress that the farmers who fed cattle this winter are pretty well 'fed up' on it."

With lower prices prevailing for almost all farm produce of which there is at this season any surplus, the cost of almost everything that the farmer and his family must buy is unreasonably high, and in many cases is still advancing. Wool is lower, but clippers and shears used in removing the wool from the sheep cost more money, as do the twine with which to tie it and the sack to hold it. While the live-stock market is lower, the price of wire to fence the feed lot or pasture in which hogs or cattle are held is priced out of all reason.

Under these conditions is it to be wondered that men out on the farms are asking, "What is the matter with the present Congress? Is it going to put the farmer out of business?" These are pertinent questions. They are proper questions, and, like Banquo's ghost, they will not down. In fact, in the language of one of the Nation's great farm leaders:

> I can conceive of nothing of more overwhelming importance than the deliverance of the farmer from the conditions which hang like a galling yoke about his neck at this time.

But the question may be asked, "Has the House passed no measures which would affect prices?" Oh, yes. There have been passed over the protest of Members on this side of the House several protective-tariff measures, including one calculated to increase the cost of every ax, every scythe, every edged tool used by the farmer. The tariff bills forced through the House do not represent large items, but they do indicate a dangerous tendency. They stand for activity in the wrong direction. Of such action the farmer will say, as said the live-stock shipper who read "Market active and 25 to 40 lower," "Darn such activity."

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any farmer, regardless of what his politics may be, will approve of the record of this Congress. I do not believe that any farmer Member, if such there be, sitting on the Republican side of this House, will "point with pride" to such performances. I am frank to say that as a Democrat, but first of all interested in the welfare of the farmer, I would not attempt to defend such a record if made by my own party. I might apologize for it, but defend it, never. No man can do that.

Let me not be misunderstood. Among the Republican Members of this House there are as patriotic citizens, as lovable characters, as genial gentlemen as on this side of the Chamber. Some of the warmest friendships I have formed here are with those of opposite political faith. Some of the truest and best friends I have in the world are Republicans. Differences between Members of this House are not personal. They represent differences of principles, of platform, and procedure.

As a rule the official action of Members represents a response to the interests and people responsible for their election. In most of the rock-ribbed Republican States manufacturing is a leading industry, just as in the dependably Democratic States farming comes first. So, in the very nature of things, we expect to find agriculture receiving the fullest recognition not only in organization but in legislation at the hands of a Democratic Congress.

In justice to individual Members of the majority I want to say it is my belief that had the present House organization been more friendly to the farmer, had the steering committee been differently constituted, there are Republicans who sometimes would have voted differently. It is therefore unfortunate not only for the farmer—whether Democrat or Republican—and for the country as a whole, but for many rightly disposed Republican Members representing rural districts, that conditions in this Congress are such as they are. Individual Congressmen have been crushed by the machine they helped make.

The farmer is warning this Congress that it can not eternally temporize. He is telling us that the worm will turn; that without remedy, without relief, want will come. He has since the convening of this body hoped and waited in vain. Daily he has seen the situation grow more serious; seen values of what he had to sell slump, while what he must buy goes skyrocketing. Under these critical conditions party names mean less than ever before—promises but little, performances everything.

Political platforms, like the pink and perfumed buds and blossoms of this month of roses, while attractive, will not satisfy this matter-of-fact farmer. Next November he will measure the result of his year's work in garnered grain, in the plenty of field, crib, and granary. So, too, will he next November weigh the work of this and other Congresses. He will be fair. With works, not words, as his standard of measure, this man to whom has been reserved the gigantic task of feeding the world, and who asks only that it be made possible for him to play his part, will seek the truth. Seeking it sincerely and unselfishly, he will not fail to find it. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, on the 14th of May last, in my absence from the floor of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. BYRNES, in a 20-minute speech, which was afterwards extended by leave in the RECORD, indulged in considerable criticism of the policy of the Republican majority in the Sixty-sixth Congress in so far as it has appointed various investigating committees. Most of his criticism is not founded on sufficient information, and all of it is violently partisan and manifestly offered for political purposes only.

In those matters attacking the committee of which I am chairman, I think I am fully advised and take this occasion to correct the gentleman from South Carolina, and to call attention to the incorrect and misleading character of his remarks.

The Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department was created by House resolution 78, adopted by the House on June 4, 1919. The vote by which this committee was authorized was 340 yeas and no nays. One of those voting for it was the gentleman from South Carolina. On the discussion of the question, Mr. POU, of North Carolina, upon the minority on the Committee on Rules, said:

> If there has been extravagance, the minority party wishes that extravagance exposed. If there has been rascality, no one is more earnestly in favor of exposing the rascal than the Democratic minority on this floor.

The gentleman from Virginia, also speaking for the minority, stated that the Democratic minority desired the investigation, wanted it to be thorough, and would support it.

Thereafer, on June 11, on House resolution 98, authorizing the select committee to hire clerks, accountants, attorneys, and so forth, the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. CLARK, minority leader, said:

> It is absolutely necessary for these gentlemen to have clerical help. It is absolutely necessary for them to have accountants. It is absolutely necessary for them to have stenographers.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri also said, in these remarks:

My suggestion is that everybody quit nagging and criticizing and lampooning until we ascertain the truth as the result of this investigation which we are undertaking and which is going to cost a good deal of money.

And this sentiment was greatly applauded on the Democratic side. Since that time the minority leader has scrupulously followed his own advice; it remained, however, for the gentleman from South Carolina to do the very thing the gentleman from Missouri has said ought not to be done, and this apparently for political purposes.

The select committee began its investigations almost immediately, and has for the past year been continuously employed in this work. In its work its subcommittees have taken evidence in 13 different States, and one of them has had extensive hearings in France. Its printed hearings comprise approximately 20,000 pages. The work has been arduous and constant, and has practically taken every man on the committee out of active participation in the other legislative business of the House for a year. Some reports have been made, some are pending, and many are yet to be made. No one who has not been a member of the committee can have any comprehension of the magnitude of the task. While the committee has labored for a year, it has as yet but scratched the surface. The immense bulk of the business of the War Department during the war will forever remain a closed book, except in so far as this and other investigations may partially disclose the facts and as the historian may unearth some parts of it.

The War Department spent from April 6, 1917, the date of the declaration of war, to September 1, 1919, $18,501,177,099.12, a sum so vast as to stagger the comprehension. A slight idea is gathered when I tell you that this represents more than $180 for each man, woman, and child in the United States. What we got for it I shall hereinafter refer to. The War Department itself does not know how many war contracts it made. I have here a volume consisting of 1,116 pages, filled completely with a list of contracts of over $100,000 in face value. It is probable there were more than 50,000 war contracts made, both formal and informal. There were over 22,000 contracts in the Ordnance Department alone.

The gentleman from South Carolina, in his zeal, criticizes the employment by the committee of certain employees. He speaks of an employee named Bennett, whom he says controls the committee. Mr. Bennett was a man of independent means, too old to enter the war. Knowing this, he came to Washington and offered his services, without compensation. He was finally hired at $1,800 a year in the Quartermaster's Department. He saw practices that outraged him in the allowances of war claims, and went to his Member of Congress, who sent him to the select committee. He was offered employment with the committee. As soon as the War Department found this had been done, Maj. Holder, of the War Claims Board, offered to double his wages and appoint him an examiner for the War Claims Board if he would stay. He declined to do so, and until recently has been employed by the committee. By his fearless investigation of the War Claims Board work, I have no doubt this one patriotic and right-minded man has saved the country millions of dollars. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Criticism is made of some moneys paid an accountant, George W. Storck. Storck is a registered accountant and was employed four days at $50 a day. The account on file with the Committee on Accounts shows that there was no duplication of accounts in his case, as the gentleman from South Carolina could have seen had he been desiring to state the exact facts instead of his political conclusions.

The committee had very few accountants employed. When Storck was paid $50 a day, he was trying to get from the Attorney General an inspection of certain audits that had been made of the Muscle Shoals expenditures, and was attempting single-handed to deal with the Attorney General, one of his asistants, and the secret service of the Department of Justice. It will be conceded, I assume, that this required the efforts of a man of ability.

Criticism is made of one C. D. Worley, a leather investigator. Although not so expressly stated, it is intimated he came from the district I represent. Such is not the case. This man lives in Iowa, and was entirely unknown to me when he came to Washington. As a matter of fact, there is not and has not been a single employee of this committee or any of its subcommittees that ever lived in my district, to my knowledge, except one man by the name of H. W. Thoreson, who assisted for a while in the Muscle Shoals investigation. Worley was employed because for 10 years or more he had worked in leather at an arsenal of the United States. The officers in the Quartermaster Department in charge of leather were almost all men who were or had been manufacturers of leather goods for the Government. We had to have some one who knew leather and who would also tell the truth about what he saw. Worley was such a man. He may have been a shop workman, but he was honest, knew what the Government ought to get for a dollar, and you could rely upon him. Practically all the facts that have appeared in the record about the leather deals of the Government during the war and the overproduction that was so pronounced were developed by this one quiet, unassuming shop workman. Incidentally, when he, a civil-service employee on leave, went back to his work at the Rock Island Arsenal he was refused employment by the Ordnance Department.

Such criticism is trivial and puerile. No one who has the slightest comprehension of what such an investigation means could for an instant indulge in it. When one thinks of the modest sums this committee has expended, he must compare it mentally with the machinery it had to investigate. He speaks of the enormity of hiring one accountant four days at $25 a day. From the outbreak of the war to this date the War Department, especially the War Claims Board, has had 78 men employed, each of whom drew more than $50 a day and many of whom are still employed. I insert the list here. Some of them get $100 a day. Experts and advisers on anything and everything. From my experience with them, the thing they do best is to draw their salaries.

No one will ever know just how much the War Department squandered on accountants and other similar help during the war. During the settlement of the Dent bill claims as many as 7,000 people—accountants, lawyers, and so forth—were employed by the War Department in their settlement. During the war and while the Ordnance Department was contracting with thousands of people and building and running countless factories, the Ordnance Department alone had in the field at one time as many as 30,000 accountants, inspectors, and the like. During the war, in the war bureaus and branches at Washington, there were employed 1,395 accountants, 385 lawyers, and 37,406 other civilian employees. The consistency of a man who votes to set a committee to work investigating the work of such an army of employees and then captiously carps and quibbles when they employ one accountant four days at $50 a day is but to be wondered at. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is said the amounts expended by the investigating committees of the House in this Congress are extravagant. It is alleged that a million dollars have been spent in the investigations. Mr. Cummings, of the Democratic National Committee, makes it $2,000,000. This is reported in the Democratic platform in Virginia and probably will serve as the model of a plank in the Democratic national platform. The fact is there has been spent by the House in all its investigations in this Congress $147,278.27. The Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has spent $116,124.32. The Senate, to May 31, 1920, on all investigations—eight in number—has spent $75,497.69. The total, therefore, for the Congress is $222,775.96. This is said to be exorbitant and unusual. What shall be said of committees which the Democratic House appointed after it came into power in 1910 and which expended from the contingent fund $288,794.60, and this in times of peace? I insert a list of them here.

The statement requested by the chairman of the committee, showing the expenditures incurred by certain committees, i. e., the committees appointed in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses, 1911–1919, to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, the American Sugar Refining Co., the so-called Money Trust, the "Taylor system," the Manufacturers' Association (Mulhall), the shipping industry, the affairs of the District of Columbia, the so-called "leak" investigation, investigations by the several standing committees on expenditures in the executive departments, and the so-called Ballinger-Pinchot investigation in the Sixty-first Congress (1909–1911), follows:

Investigation of the United States Steel Corporation	$4,643.91
Investigation of the American Sugar Refining Co	7,556.83

The resolutions authorizing these investigations were in identically the same language and authorized, respectively, investigations of alleged violations of the antitrust and other acts. Vouchers covering expenses of both committees were submitted in practically the same form, so that it is impossible to differentiate them and identify those relating to the sugar investigation and those relating to the steel investigation. Therefore, except to the extent above indicated by the figures set opposite the respective headings, they are included as expenses of the—

Investigation of alleged violations of the antitrust and other acts	37,408.89
Total for sugar and steel investigations	49,609.63
Investigation by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the so-called Money Trust	61,277.12
Investigation of the "Taylor system"	4,287.00
Investigation of the Manufacturers' Association	4,119.56
Investigation of the shipping industry	15,284.00
Investigation of the affairs of the District of Columbia	51,191.03
Investigation of charges by F. T. Lawson (leak)	22,883.76
Investigation of expenditures in the Interior Department	13,503.16
Investigation of expenditures in the Post Office Department	10,639.96

Investigation of expenditures in the Treasury Department	3,682.78
Investigation of expenditures in the Department of Justice	3,834.48
Investigation of expenditures in the War Department	3,665.13
Investigation of expenditures in the Navy Department	3,074.60
Investigation of expenditures in the State Department	2,969.20
Investigation of expenditures on public buildings	2,135.90
Investigation of the Forestry Service (Ballinger-Pinchot)	[1] 25,000.00
Grand total	288,794.60

As a matter of fact, about one-third of the amount expended by the select committee, of which I am chairman, has been for stenographic work. It is said the War Department has been put to great expense in preparing material for the committee. If so, it is due to the fault and lack of system of the War Department. The committee made but few requests, and these requests were such as should have been speedily answered. For instance, we inquired what the War Department had spent during the war, and the War Department was asked for a list of war contracts in face value over $100,000. Aside from these matters, almost all the requests were for specific papers or for witnesses who could tell us of particular matters. As a matter of fact, the utmost confusion prevailed in the War Department. When requests were made, sometimes it seemed to be necessary for them to hire experts to hunt it. Information given the committee was frequently erroneous. For instance, the Secretary of War informed the committee on June 20, 1919, as to the total expenditures of the War Department during the war, divided into departments. The figures he gave were afterwards found by a committee accountant to be erroneous in some items as much as $184,945,938.47. The Director of Finance, Gen. Lord, was asked on January 6, 1920, what the cost of the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals was. He gave $42,570,000 as the figure. On March 23, 1920, after testimony had been brought out by the committee showing the expense to have been approximately $60,000,000, The Adjutant General communicated to the committee that he had been in error, and that the correct amount was approximately $70,000,000. An officer, Lieut. Col. T. N. Gimperling, of the Quartermaster's Department, sent by the War Department to the committee for that purpose, testified the Government had purchased 28,000,000 pairs of shoes during the war.

Our own investigators developed that 32,227,450 pairs had been bought. In one case the chief of manufacture in the Ordnance Department informed the committee that 3,600 machines of a certain type had been moved into a certain storehouse. It developed that the correct number was 2,100. Almost as soon as the committee was appointed, June 18, 1919, it directed 27 questions in writing to the Secretary of War, seeking certain information, and particularly the amounts expended during the war. The last of these questions was answered September 18, 1919. Whenever the committee asked about any particular thing, it seemed to be necessary to build up a staff of experts to get the information, information which ought to have been easily available from the books of the department. When one of the subcommittees began an investigation of some small claims in the War Department Claims Board, employees were brought in from outlying districts to defend the department. In one case the committee room would hardly hold the Government representatives, both military and civilian, brought from Boston, New York, Chicago, and elsewhere, and who remained for weeks, defending the board. When the committee took testimony in other places military officers were sent with the committee at Government expense, but where they were required by the committee the War Department required them to be paid from the contingent funds of the House.

It is said the investigation has been futile from a money standpoint.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No. I have not the time.

It is hard to discern exactly what effect the investigations of the committee have had. It will be remembered that the committee has been investigating departments that must necessarily reflect upon themselves if they give credit to the criticisms of the committee. However, some tangible effects are noticeable.

The committee reported out House resolution No. 212 from subcommittee No. 4, requesting the Secretary of War to sell to the people the surplus Army food held by it and valued at approximately $100,000,000. The War Department had entered into tentative agreements with the packers and canners not to put this food upon the market, and were using every method to dispose of it by feeding it to soldiers or otherwise, so that it should not be sold to the people. As a result of the passage of this resolution by almost a unanimous vote of the House, this food was placed upon the market. Up to this time $57,000,000 of this food has been sold, and that much money has gone into the Treasury that would otherwise have not been there.

The committee reported out House resolution No. 362 from subcommittee No. 4, requesting the Secretary of War to distribute through the Agricultural Department for distribution among highway departments of the States 22,195 motor vehicles and to sell the balance. The House passed the resolution by almost a unanimous vote. Thereupon the Secretary of War, who had theretofore failed to distribute any of these motor vehicles to the highway departments, began the distribution and has thus distributed machines to the value of $67,341,479. In addition to this, $2,800,000 has been paid into the Treasury for machines sold. If it had not been for the report of this committee, in all probability these machines would now be rusting in storage.

The committee made an oral report to the House on October 14, 1919, relative to the sale of the Government powder plant at Nitro, W. Va. At that time bids had been received for this plant, the highest being $5,800,000. The committee called the attention of the House forcibly to the matter, and also advised the director of sales that it be informed of the nature of the bids received before any sale was made. Thereafter all bids were rejected, and the property readvertised. At this resale it brought $8,551,000.

The committee began an investigation of war claims filed with the War Department Claims Board under the Dent Act. It reported its investigations to the House on November 11, 1919. In this report it specifically insisted on the necessity of an audit of war claims. As a result of this report, the War Department Claims Board has been demanding and receiving greatly advanced salvaged prices for goods turned over to contractors, and millions have been saved to the Government thereby. As an example, tin plate, which was before this report considered as worth only $33 a ton, was revalued at $110 a ton, and the Government received this price. Contractors' claims were rigidly inspected and an immense sum saved thereby.

The committee began a vigorous examination of the allowance of contractors' war claims by the War Department Claims Board on September 8, 1919. Doubtless influenced by the disclosures of loose practices developed by the committee, on November 7, 1919, the War Department Claims Board adopted a rule requiring an audit to accompany all claims from district and zone claims boards, a practice that had not obtained theretofore. This resulted in an immense saving to the Government in the settlement of claims under the Dent Act.

In addition to the above, on October 3, 1919, a special auditing committee was appointed by the War Department to audit these war claims, a practice that never before had obtained. This committee is engaged in the audit of about 350 claims that have been allowed and paid, and expects to recover approximately $10,000,000.

How many criminals have been uncovered? Asks the gentleman from South Carolina. It matters not how many have been uncovered, it goes without saying that none will be prosecuted while the present administration continues. During the war hundreds of people were prosecuted by the vigilant Attorney General for violation of the espionage act; but who has heard of a prosecution of a war profiteer? I say to you, with a full comprehension of the nature of the charge, that there are thousands of men who have violated the law during the war, of whom the Attorney General's Department has full knowledge, and none of whom has been or will be prosecuted. You talk of prosecution! You might as well submit to the prisoner in the dock the question of his own guilt. There will be no prosecutions, no court-martials. What this committee uncovers will be laughed to scorn by the War Department and Department of Justice. But I take considerable hope in the thought that after the 4th of next March another Secretary of War and another Attorney General will have something to say about the administration of these matters if, happily, anything is left to administer upon.

While time and space will permit mention only of a few of the instances disclosed by the record, it will be instructive to here indicate a few of the instances which indicate the faulty nature of both the language and the facts of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Col. Edward A. Deeds, while in charge of the aviation section of the Signal Corps, let about $50,000,000 worth of contracts to his friends in Dayton, Ohio, acted as confidential adviser to his former business associate, H. E. Talbot, of the Dayton-Wright Airplane Co., in respect to business between that company and the division over which he was the head; he also gave to the representatives of the Committee on Public Information false and misleading statements with respect to the progress of aircraft production for the purpose of publication, with the authority of the Secretary of War. Ex-Justice Hughes, acting by appointment of the President, recommended him for court-martial; the Attorney General and Judge Advocate General concurred. Secretary Baker intervened, ordered him retried, and, as a result, he was whitewashed, and immediately thereafter was tendered a banquet at Washington by Gen. Squier, head of the Signal Corps, where he was joyously acclaimed as one of the heroes of the war.

Director of Aircraft John D. Ryan, while director, ordered the continued manufacture of De Haviland 4 observation planes at a time when it had been called to his attention by responsible officials and a committee from the United States Senate that these machines were "flaming coffins," were killing our aviators, and were entirely unsuited to their purposes, and that the public moneys were being squandered in their production.

Director Ryan, while director and the responsible head of the department, consented to and was fully cognizant of the construction, by his subordinate officers, of a so-called spruce railroad in Oregon, 38 miles long and costing $4,000,000 or $110,000 a mile, connecting with the Milwaukee Railroad, of which Mr. Ryan was then a director.

This railroad was of no value as a logging road, and was only of value as an extension of Mr. Ryan's railroad. Mr. Ryan was given the distinguished-service medal for his services by the Secretary of War.

Colonel, afterwards brigadier general, Brice P. Disque, formerly a captain at $3,000 a year, then warden of the Michigan Penitentiary, then called to the War Department during the war as a colonel in the Spruce Production Division of Aviation, built 13 railroads for spruce operations at an average cost of $107,000 per mile, and over which no logs were hauled, and one of which roads was the road built connecting with Mr. Ryan's Milwaukee road. He caused large numbers of soldiers to be sent to him, and these he paid civilian wages while other soldiers in France served for $1 a day. This was in direct violation of statutory law; $4,500,000 was expended in this way. For his services Col. Disque was made brigadier general, given the distinguished-service medal by the Secretary of War, and was taken from the War Department on the signing of the armistice and given a position by Mr. John D. Ryan as president of one of Mr. Ryan's companies, the Amsinck Co., at a salary of $30,000 a year, a salary twice that of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, a position which he now holds.

Gen. G. O. Squier, Chief of the Signal Corps, with the consent of Secretary of War Baker, permitted the waste of over a billion dollars of public funds, knew and consented to the construction of American flying machines that were deadly and inefficient, and to the purchase in France for our aviators of Sopwith planes which had been abandoned and considered obsolete by the French for over a year and a half before they were purchased by us. He was condemned by ex-Justice Hughes, in his report to the Department of Justice, as inefficient and incompetent. He was given the distinguished service medal by Secretary Baker, and is still at the head of the Signal Corps of the Army.

William A. Starret, an architect and chairman of the subcommittee on emergency construction from the Council of National Defense, contrived the system of cost-plus contracts that was used during the war in the building of camps and cantonments. In the making of this plan and the contracts under it the interests of the Government were ignored and all safeguards for the Government were omitted, principally by direction and consent of Mr. Starret, who was supposed to be guarding and representing the Government in these matters.

Thousands of dollars paid as automobile hire by the United States was received by representatives of A. Bentley & Sons Co., in charge of transportation, for the contractors at Camp Sherman, Ohio, fraudulently, and which are recoverable by the Government from the contractor.

Favored contractors, some of which were former friends or clients, were selected or designated by William A. Starret, and these contractors were, in turn, given by contract large fees for supervision, far in excess of any sums which they would otherwise, or by open bidding, have received.

Scores of foremen and superintendents and others in positions of authority are named in the report of the subcommittee on camps, who have personally caused, ordered, aided, or abetted waste and wanton destruction of property, paid for with Government funds. All this was done with the apparent knowledge and consent of the contractors. Such acts constitute frauds against the Government, and every man who was a party to this violated the law and is personally and criminally responsible. The names of these men are plainly evident to anyone who reads the record.

The contractors responsible for this waste and destruction of property are liable to the Government for the amount of such waste, and civil suit may be maintained against them, unless the Government is estopped by the acts of its agents.

Millions of dollars were paid out to owners of by-product coke oven projects on a so-called Falk chart, a chart that was false and fraudulent, and was prepared for the purpose of permitting these claimants to receive greater sums of money from the Government on their settlements. This money could be recovered. The names of every officer and man connected with this matter are in the record.

Thousands of claims were adjusted by the War Claims Board where insufficient salvage values were allowed the Government by means of the intent or ignorance of the persons having to do with the settlement on the part of the Government. Millions of dollars improperly paid might be recovered under the Dent Act on these claims.

Officers resigned from the military service and took employment with contractors who had claims against the Government. In some instances these officers represented the claimant. This was in direct violation of law. The names are in the record.

Large numbers of officers in the War Department were drawing salaries from the Government and from private employers at the same time, and in most instances their duties as officers had to do with contracts which their business associates had with the Government. This was in direct violation of law. The names of such officers appear in the record.

Officers were authorized to make purchases of military supplies. In some instances these contracts were made with firms or companies in which the officer had a financial interest. This was in direct violation of law. The names of such officers are to be found in the record.

Scores of foremen and superintendents employed by the contractors at Nitro, W. Va., and Muscle Shoals, Ala., directed loafing of men and ordered wanton and deliberate destruction of materials and property. Their names are in the record. Every man who did this committed a crime.

The administration building at Nitro, W. Va., was burned on the night of November 9, 1918, after news of a supposed armistice had been received, destroying many records of the Thompson-Starret Co. Every fact seemed to indicate arson. The special representative of the Department of Justice there requested that an investigation be made. Nothing was done.

The chief of police at Nitro was reported by the Government's agent as stealing blankets at wholesale for sale. When it was reported to the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, the agent was reprimanded for sending the telegram, and nothing was done.

Hundreds of workmen at Muscle Shoals were arrested, taken to jail, or fined by men without warrants, and without a trace of legal authority, in open violation of law.

The wanton waste of materials constituted crime that would be punished by any court having jurisdiction. To illustrate: On one occasion, the Secretary of War was to make a Liberty loan speech at Nitro, W. Va. In order to clear a place for the erection of a small platform from which he could speak, they set a large force of men to work the night before, hauled off a large pile of good lumber covering an acre and a half and piled 10 feet high, and before morning burned every foot of it. The names of the men responsible for this are in the record.

Hundreds of horses having nothing wrong except, perhaps, a temporary lameness or sore back were killed and burned with the finest lumber provided by the Government. The names of those directing this brutality and waste are in the record.

Approximately $2,000,000 was paid to the Standard Steel Car Co., of Hammond, Ind., which was pronounced by the Government accountants to be absolutely without justice or foundation; the award was approved by the fraudulent practices of Col. E. S. Hughes and other officers of the military service whose names are in the record. Civil and criminal proceedings might well be brought in this case.

To attempt with any economy of time and space to give the names of individuals who have committed crimes or to direct specific attention to civil suits which might be instituted would be impossible. The committee has gathered the testimony in great volume. It suffices to say that the record bristles with such names and instances. The bulk, however, of the business transactions of the Government during the war were so vast as to stagger comprehension. There were probably 50,000 war contracts made. To examine them is the labor of a lifetime. Only a cursory glimpse of the entire field can be had, and an occasional contract inspected. The investigation of each such contract is a long and involved proceeding and requires months of effort and study. For example, the contracts of Jones & Laughlin Co., American Can Co., Standard Steel Car Co., and American Brake Shoe & Foundry Co. each required extended investigation and time. A typical example is the contract for purchase of canned salmon for the Army, the facts being furnished me by Mr. REAVIS, chairman of the subcommittee on quartermaster supplies:

The War Department, through the Quartermaster Corps, between the 6th of April, 1917, and the 11th of November, 1918, purchased 208,681,244 1-pound cans of salmon, at a total cost of $38,814,703.91. This salmon was purchased by commandeering the output, with the Food Administration to fix the price upon an investigation of cost to be made by the Federal Trade Commission. The first cost was fixed at $6 per case of 48 cans for tall pink salmon, $6.50 per case for tall medium red, and $7 per case for tall red. This was considered a tentative price that was subject to revision, either by being increased or lowered when the Federal Trade Commission made its report of cost. Before the Federal Trade Commission made its report of cost, the War Department, on its own motion, increased the price of the better grade of salmon to $7.50 per case. A great deal of this salmon was found to be spoiled salmon. The list of spoiled salmon will be found on pages 919, 920, 921, 922, 923, 924, 925, and 926 of serial 5, part 19.

The contract of purchase guaranteed the Government against all loss because of spoiled salmon. The Government purchased this salmon f. o. b. Seattle, and then shipped it to its eastern warehouses, the Government, of course, paying the freight. Some of this salmon was stored for many months, during which time the Government kept it insured. In many instances the spoiled salmon was spoiled at the time it was canned, and this fact was known to the canners (pp. 878, 879, 880, and 885, ser. 5, pt. 18). Most of the salmon found to be spoiled by the Bureau of Chemistry was in cans which were not swells. This, according to the testimony of the experts, conclusively shows that the fish was spoiled at the time it was canned (p. 904, ser. 5, p. 19, and p. 917 of the same serial and part). Notwithstanding the Government was fully protected on the spoiled salmon and was entitled not only to the money paid to the canners for the salmon, but was entitled to return of the freight from Seattle to the eastern warehouses, the storage and insurance charges, and the interest on the money, the War Department executed a contract, shown on page 351, part 17, serial 5, whereby it agreed to keep this salmon stored for six months without charge to the canners (this storage was in commercial storage, for which we paid 2 cents a case per month. Some of it is still in storage at our expense. We paid the canners 2 cents per month storage for all salmon of ours held by them awaiting delivery orders) to keep it insured at the expense of the Government, to pay the freight charges to wherever the canners wanted it shipped, and to make a reduction of from 31 to 47½ cents a case for what they called "reconditioning." We also sold all the good salmon under this contract back to the packers for the price that we paid for it, agreed to keep it stored for six months, to pay the insurance on it, and to pay the cartage charges and the freight charges to any point that the packers ordered it shipped. We lost under this contract $3,000,000 (p. 857, ser. 5, pt. 17). At the time we were selling this salmon back to them for the original price, less than the reductions noted, the same salmon was worth on the open market $12.60 a case. If we figure the loss sustained by not selling it on the open market, it will approximate $15,000,000 (p. 891, ser. 5, pt. 28). It is shown in the testimony by the officers of the War Department, and is not disputed anywhere, that notwithstanding we allowed a reduction of from 31 to 47½ cents a case for reconditioning, not a single case was ever reconditioned by the packers, and this reduction was simply a gift.

The Navy Department purchased its salmon in the same way and of the same people. The Navy Department returned a very small proportion of its salmon to the packers, but compelled them to pay, in addition to the original price paid by the Navy Department, the freight from Seattle to the warehouse, all storage and insurance charges, together with interest on the money, and then made the canners pay the freight from the warehouse to wherever they wanted it shipped. The most of the Navy Department's surplus salmon was sold, for which they received $9.32 a case. (P. 1093, ser. 5, pt. 20.) This was the same kind of salmon that the War Department at the same time was turning back to the canners at less than $7 a case.

The War Department refused an offer made by McCord & Brady and Paxton & Gallagher, of Omaha, Nebr., two of the most reliable jobbing firms in the world, of $10 a case for the same salmon, which they put back in the hands of the canners for about $7 a case. (P. 867, ser. 5, pt. 17.) The Omaha warehouse was filled with salmon. By consulting serial 5, part 20, on pages 1021 to 1056, it will show the packers sold this Army salmon, which the Government was holding for it, among others to McCord & Brady and Paxton & Gallagher, for which the Government received, it being an inferior grade of salmon, but $6 a case, and the salmon was shipped to these jobber firms, together with firms in Lincoln, Nebr., Kansas City, Mo., Atchison, Kans., and other places in the vicinity of Omaha, from New York and Baltimore to these places, with the Government paying the freight, while the salmon that was in the Omaha warehouse, instead of being turned over to the Omaha firms, was shipped from Omaha to the eastern market, the Government paying the freight that way. The total freight paid by the Government on this salmon was shown on page 982, serial 5, part 20, to have amounted to $205,768.19. The salmon that was sold back to the packers for the original price, ranging from $6 to $7.75, depending on the class of the salmon, less storage, interest, insurance, reconditioning, and freight, was selling on the open market at a part of the time when these sales were made as high as $16 a case, and the Government could more than have doubled its money if it had sold on the open market instead of turning it back to the canners. The salmon was sold by the canners to the jobbers at the prevailing market price, which was from $9.50 to $16 per case, and the consumer did not benefit a penny in the premises.

The testimony shows conclusively that the War Department and the Bureau of Chemistry knew that the canners were willfully and knowingly packing spoiled fish and selling it to the Government. They knew it not alone from an inspection of the cans in which the absence of swelling showed it to be spoiled but they knew it by a personal inspection of the fish and the canneries at the time it was being canned, and yet no presecution has ever been instituted for this violation of the food law, even though soldiers might have been poisoned and killed by eating this spoiled food.

It is said the chairman of the committee has maligned and abused the Council of National Defense. Here again the gentleman from South Carolina has not been careful in his criticism. But he is not alone in this.

Attention has been repeatedly called by Democratic Members to the alleged fact that the committee has sought to criticize the Council of National Defense for making secret preparations for war months before the war began. A careful reading of the record of the committee will disclose that the criticism is not so much directed against the Council of National Defense as against the policy of the administration that created the council. On August 26, 1916, the act authorizing the creation of a Council of National Defense became the law. A political campaign was in full swing. Not a step was taken toward the meeting of the Council of National Defense for three months and until after the election. Meantime the President and his party went about the country telling the people they had been kept out of war and telling them we would continue at peace. The campaign textbook of the Democratic Party in 1916 bore on its cover in bold letters these words: "Peace with honor, preparedness, prosperity." They circulated about the country, showing pictures in colors of the President, with this legend upon it: "Peace with honor, he kept us out of war." And then at the bottom, to signify verity, his signature, "Yours, Woodrow Wilson." With this miserable deceit the American people were deluded. The statements that were being made to the country were not true and were circulated only for political effect. Almost before the votes at the election were counted, on November 11, 1916, Secretary Baker called the Council of National Defense to meet at Washington on December 6. They met there, and less than a month after President Wilson and his party had solemnly assured the country there would be no war this council were meeting in secret session and beginning their consideration of measures to draft the young men of the country, to put a censorship on the press, and for a daylight-saving law.

The German Government did not notify us it intended to resume its unrestricted submarine warfare until January 31, 1917, almost a month afterwards. The criticism is not directed, gentlemen, at the plans, but at the administration that knows the truth and calls its ministers together to confer about it while it deludes and deceives the Congress of the United States and the people.

Permit me, however, to say that the preparedness that was the slogan of the Democratic campaign textbook and the plans of the Council of National Defense were paper preparedness and paper plans only. Not a single additional gun was bought or made, not an additional pound of powder prepared, not a ship built, not a flying machine ordered. Not a single blue print or specification was made, not a contract entered into, not an inventory of our industrial resources made, not a thing but secret plans to have Congress pass a draft act, a daylight-saving law, and a carefully prepared plan by which the Government might buy supplies from the manufacturers and fix prices for the producer.

WHAT WE GOT FOR OUR MONEY.

The gentleman from South Carolina says, as do many other gentlemen from the Democratic side of the House, that, while there was necessarily some waste in our war expenditures, in the main the funds so lavishly taken from the Treasury and from the pockets of the people went far toward "winning the war." In view of such contentions it is well to briefly inspect some of the more salient features of these expenditures and the results accomplished, as shown by the hearings.

We expended $1,051,511,988 for aviation and airplanes, and up to the time of signing of the armistice not a single fighting plane was at the American front.

As a result of our entire aviation program we obtained 213 De Haviland 4 observation planes, all of which were illy designed and constructed and extremely dangerous, and 527 second-hand foreign planes, which we either bought or borrowed from our associates in the war.

We expended $50,000,000 on a spruce-production program, building elaborate railroads, camps, and facilities, and then were forced to buy 92.6 per cent of our spruce lumber from private independent spruce lumbermen.

We spent approximately $10,000,000 on spruce railroads that never hauled a log of lumber.

We spent $20,000,000 for 4,608 Curtiss motors, 1,616 Curtiss-type aeroplanes, and 1,100 Standard JN–1 aeroplanes, which we purchased from the Curtiss Aeroplane & Motor Corporation, then sold them back to this company for $2,720,000. The War Department refused to sell these machines to aviators for less than $3,500 each, and provided in the contract by which they were sold to the Curtiss Co. that the Curtiss Co. should have the first opportunity to buy any other aeroplanes which the War Department might thereafter declare surplus.

We spent $6,000,000 on Bristol planes and $17,500,000 on Standard-J planes, and got not a single machine that could be used for any purpose.

We spent $206,632,920 for 16 National Army cantonments, built by the cost-plus system. These could have been built for $128,101,399, or $78,531,521 less.

We expended $1,200,000,000 for the construction of camps and cantonments, largely by the cost-plus system, a system adopted by the War Department. By this system costs were increased, labor demoralized, the completion of the camps was delayed, soldiers called to the colors were subjected to conditions that induced disease and death, and from 40 to 60 per cent of the money was wasted.

Twenty-two million dollars was spent for fees to favored contractors on camps and cantonments, most of which would have been saved had this work been let by bids.

We spent $60,100,000 to build a powder plant at Nitro, W. Va. It never produced a pound of powder for the war. After the armistice there was stored at Nitro personal property worth at a fair cash value $10,000,000. Both plant and property were sold after the armistice for $8,551,000, most of which is in deferred payments.

We paid the Hercules Powder Co. for operating the Nitro plant $11,293,737.11. They produced no powder that we could use in the war.

We spent $2,900,000 in furnishing electrical machinery and building electric lines for the Virginia Power Co. at Nitro, W. Va., and after we had built them a first-class system, giving them a practical monopoly of the Kanawha Valley, the Government settled with them for $81,000 and in addition gave them a long-time contract to furnish electric power for the naval armor plant at Charleston, W. Va.

We spent approximately $90,000,000 in the construction and operation of a powder plant at Nashville, Tenn., called Old Hickory, and which produced no powder that could be used in the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. May I have some more time?

Mr. GOOD. How much more times does the gentleman wish?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If I have 10 minutes, I can finish what I have to say.

Mr. GOOD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We spent man ymillions, the exact amount being unknown, for the production of tanks, and did not produce a single tank that reached the front before the armistice. To complete our tank program we needed 1,200 tanks, which were to cost $25,000 each. To build these we started an immense steel and concrete factory in France, which was to assembl and turn out 100 of these tanks a day, or the entire supply in 12 days. The British were to furnish the guns and armor and ship them to France for assembly, while we were to furnish the engines and running gear, and ship them to France for assembly. The British supplied their part, but we supplied nothing. The factory was unfinished at the armitice and never produced anything.

We spent $116,194,974.37 on nitrate plants at Sheffield, Ala.; Muscle Shoals, Ala.; Toledo, Ohio; and Cincinnati, Ohio. These plants did not produce a pound of nitrates that could be used in the war.

We spent for poison gas $116,000,000. Not a pound of American gas was ever fired in an American shell, and only about 100 tons of American gas loaded in shells ever reached the field dumps.

The Government built three picric-acid plants and seven plants to make phenol and acid required by them. This was to furnish picric acid for the French, who desired it for explosives. None of these plants produced a pound of anything that was used in the war. The plants cost us $35,000,000. The French were to pay the whole bill, but the War Department settled with France for $14,000,000.

We spent $17,116,000 in constructing a port terminal at Charleston, S. C. It was built in an isolated swamp 10 miles up the Cooper River, where it was necessary to dredge to reach it. There never was a pound of produce, a man, or an animal shipped either out of or in to this terminal during the war.

We spent $127,661,000 for port terminals at Boston, Brooklyn, Newark, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Charleston, and New Orleans. Some of them were not finished and none of them were used for anything except storage during the war.

The Ordnance Department spent $3,991,489,570.48 from the beginning of the war until June 1, 1919, as much as it cost to finance the Civil War. A large part of it was spent in a program of manufacturing artillery and ammunition. This is what we got for it:

We had 53 contracts for 37-millimeter shells, on which we expended $9,134,582. Not one of these shells ever reached our firing line.

We had 689 contracts for 75-millimeter shells, on which we expended $301,941,459. Of these shells we fired 6,000.

We had 142 contracts for 3-inch shells, on which we expended $44,841,844. None of these shells reached the firing line.

We had 439 contracts for 4.7 shells, on which we expended $41,716,051. Of these shells 14,000 were fired by our forces.

We had 305 contracts for 6-inch shells, on which we expended $24,189,075. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 617 contracts for 155-millimeter shells, on which we expended $264,955,387. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 301 contracts for 8-inch shells, on which we expended $51,371,207. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 152 contracts for 240-millimeter shells, on which we expended $24,136,867. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 239 contracts for 9.2 shells, on which we expended $54,389,377. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 71 contracts for 12-inch shells, on which we expended $9,507,878. None of these ever reached the firing line.

We had 6 contracts for 14-inch shells, on which we spent $1,266,477. None of these reached the firing line.

We let 111 contracts, to the amount of $478,828,345, for the construction of artillery of all calibers, guns, howitzers, gun carriages, limbers, and recuperators. Of this immense program of expenditures there reached our troops and were actually used in combat thirty-nine 75-millimeter antiaircraft mount trucks, forty-eight 4.7-inch guns of the 1906 model, forty-eight 4.7-inch gun carriages of the same model, twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, and twenty-four 8-inch gun carriages. The details are shown in a table furnished by the War Department and attached as an appendix hereto.

To sum up, we furnished our troops for use six thousand 75-millimeter shells, fourteen thousand 4.7 shells, forty-eight 4.7 guns, and twenty-four 8-inch howitzers.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I have not the time.

These are the principal things soldiers need to fight with—guns and shells, gas, aeroplanes, and tanks. And while there was such a failure to produce these essential things, it is amazing to know what excessive orders and expenditures there were on other less essential things. A few instances will indicate this:

We ordered 41,100,152 pairs of shoes and received deliveries of 32,227,450 pairs for 3,513,837 men.

We bought and received 500,326 double sets of harness and 110,828 single sets. We had, in all, during the period of the war 580,182 horses, of which only 67,948 were shipped overseas and 96,000 died.

We bought 945,000 saddles and had, in all, 86,418 Cavalry horses.

We bought 2,850,853 halters.

We bought 585,615 saddle bags.

We bought 1,637,199 horse brushes.

We bought 2,033,204 nose bags.

We bought 1,148,364 horse covers.

We bought for our Ordnance officers 712,510 complete sets of spur straps, about 36 sets for each officer. We proposed to have our Ordnance officers properly spurred. [Laughter.]

We bought 8,781,516 horseshoes.

We bought 195,000 branding irons.

We ordered 149,456,611 hard-bread cans and used 31,500,000 during the war.

Mr. DAVEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I can not.

Who won the war? Not the present administration. It has but little ground for self-congratulation. It failed in preparedness. It failed in accomplishment. It filled the air with fine phrases and spent the people's money. But I will tell you who won the war. The people, whose great heart was stirred to sacrifice and whose funds flowed out in a golden stream. But above all, it was the man with the gun, the American soldier, the best in the world. He won the war. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of the investigation now being conducted by the Federal Trade Commission in dealing with the sugar situation in the West, and in that connection I wish to print a very brief letter from the acting chairman of the commission, Mr. Huston Thompson.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KINKAID. If the gentleman from New York will further yield, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the budget scheme.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the gentleman from New York will further yield, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of national taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of national taxation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of war expenditures pertaining to the Subcommittee on Quartermasters, of which I am a member.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] is recognized.

Mr. SMITH of New York. Mr. Chairman, as an American and an American Congressman I can not ignore Ireland's just plea in her struggle for independence. To my mind for us to view with unconcern her pleadings for freedom, to permit her to stand out as the only white country barred from the family of nations, would be the basest sort of ingratitude—a reflection on our national honor and a violation of American ideals and traditions.

We have gloried always in the distinction, and rightly so, of being universally regarded as the champion of popular rights and the friend and advocate of oppressed and liberty-seeking peoples. And we have the consolation of knowing that our actions in the past justify that gratifying distinction. Hence it is but natural that the Irish people should turn to us in their hour of stress as our forefathers turned to theirs for aid in Revolutionary days.

And what are we asked to do? To extend to Ireland the same whole-hearted American support which under similar circumstances we gave the South American colonies; Cuba and the Philippines when they rose against Spain; and the Greeks rose against the Turks, the French against the Bourbons, the Poles against the Russians, and the Hungarians against the Austrians. And let us remember that this just appeal comes to us at a time when we rejoice to see the territories that were once Poland's resurrected by the Allies, the Czechoslavs and the Jugoslavs restored to their own, and Palestine freed from the clutches of the unspeakable Turks.

In view of all these events, who in this House, at a time like this, hesitates to extend a helping hand to the red-blooded white people of Ireland, whose sons for centuries have been fighting and bleeding for right and justice, who have poured out their blood on American battle fields as a free offering to the cause of American independence, and who have done the same in every war in every land where the issue was the sacred one of human freedom?

Let us not forget that Ireland is demanding the same rights from England that our ancestors demanded from that Government in 1776—the right to government only by the consent of the governed; that she asks only for the application of the principles embodied in the American Declaration of Independence, principles that won the Revolutionary War, principles for which Irishmen fought and died in that war.

Whether you will or not, the Irish question stands out boldly as a problem of the hour, a problem that not only concerns the welfare of America, but the welfare of the world. It stands out as a question of justice, right, and humanity. And manifestly, if the application of these principles is denied Ireland, there can be no lasting peace in the world, either within or without a League of Nations, so long as she or any other nationality is denied the right of self-government.

The world is weary of war and weary, too, of political hypocrisy and sham. In the present crisis the best friend England would have is the one that would solve the Irish problem by convincing her that a war which fails to bring justice will certainly fail to bring peace.

Let us contemplate the situation on the other side. The British Empire, one of the Allies for whose preservation America sacrificed her sons, expended billions, supplied the bulk of material resources, incurred a staggering debt, now begs us, in the name of a bankrupt world, a starving humanity, to feed the population of Europe, to postpone payment of their debts, to accept mandates, to support newly created independent nationalities, while at the same time she hurls into Ireland an army of soldiers with all the deadly engines of destruction and implements of war to destroy an unarmed, God-fearing, civilized, patriotic race of white men, whose demand for the right of self-government has ever been asserted and will continue to be asserted, until, with or without the assistance of the United States, they will create a free and independent Ireland among the nations of the earth.

Twelve months ago the gentleman from Illinois introduced a bill designed to help Ireland, known as the Mason bill, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Why in the name of American straightforwardness have the Republicans, as sponsors for that bill, evaded the performance of their duty and broken their word by failing to report it?

Single-handed and alone, on the Republican side, the gentleman from Illinois fought a desperate fight for his original resolution. We aided him at every turn. Driven back by the Tories on his side, he never yielded, but extorted from his party friends the resolution which was finally reported. They yielded it only in fear of the consequences of their refusal of his first proposition, and knowing they had in the Speaker's hands the weapon which would torpedo the bill by a refusal to recognize anyone to move it. The gentleman from Illinois did not fear to brook the wrath of his party organization and machine. He demanded recognition of the Speaker and met a blunt, positive refusal. Let him tell the tale of how the Republican Speaker of a Republican House strangled the resolution to express sympathy with Ireland in the idle hours it recessed on its last day.

Mr. MASON says for publication:

Speaker GILLETT has informed me that a motion to bring up the Irish resolution will not be considered at this session. As the Speaker's decision, under the rules, is final, and I can see no way to change his views, it is a waste of effort to struggle further against the influences which have caused delay upon delay, and postponed a report to the House until the closing hours of the session, when there is a tremendous pressure of business.

For months I have labored to secure action. The hearing was held December 12; the chairman never issued a call for a committee meeting to vote on my bill until May 24, and the meeting was then continued to May 27. Those American citizens interested in securing definite action have a right to feel aggrieved. It is not fair to avoid responsibility by delaying action until it becomes plausible to plead too much business to consider the cause of freedom for an oppressed people.

My original bill provided for a direct appropriation for diplomatic representatives to the Republic of Ireland. Mr. FLOOD, the leading Democratic Member, stated, in substance, that he could not support that form of resolution, and in fact a majority of the committee was clearly against me, although we have had no roll call on that question.

With the approval of the real friends of Irish freedom, I consented to adopt practically the Texas resolution, and we could not be sure of a majority for that.

Afterwards we agreed on a very modest resolution which expressed the hope of Congress that Ireland would have a government of its own choice and this was reported favorably. I think the vote was 11 to 7.

The resolution is not dead, but will have to sleep until the reconvening of Congress. Two-thirds of both Houses have shown by past votes favor toward this resolution, in substance. The House, in the last Congress, by an overwhelming two-thirds vote, expressed the hope that the peace conference would favorably consider independence for Ireland, and the Senate, by a unanimous vote, lacking one, has approved this thought.

For months I have realized and stated in the committee that my resolution was being chloroformed, but there is a favorable report now and I am thankful for being able to go as far as we have, and we are just beginning.

The real friends of Irish freedom here, represented by the National Bureau of Information, supported by American citizens, have been very fair, have conducted their affairs in a dignified and respectful way, and have always acted in accordance with the laws and customs of the country in presenting their petitions, in which they were entirely within their legal rights.

I confess I am leaving disappointed at the ruling of the Speaker, but whatever is done by this Congress, at the next session of Congress, in my opinion, the American people who believe in self-government will elect representatives who will express their opinion for the benefit of all the world. It will be done repeatedly as it has in the past entirely under the American policy established for more than 100 years to peacefully and respectfully give recognition without intervention.

I used to get discouraged at times when so many of our people were opposed to a Cuban Republic. But it has come through, and Cuba is one of our best friends. So, in my humble opinion the Irish Republic will come through without bloodshed and take its place among the nations friendly to Great Britain and to all the world, and men living now will wonder how and why it was delayed so long.

You may search, if you will, the records of the proceedings of this House from the time the first Congress assembled to legislate for the United States and nowhere in its archives will you find such an exhibition of craven mind, of ungrateful soul, of disregard of the principles of right and justice, of hypocrisy and sham, and of such shameful treatment of a great race as you have in the story of the Mason resolution and the efforts of the friends of Ireland to obtain congressional assistance.

Well might the disillusioned men and women of Irish blood now say:

> Be these juggling fiends no more believed
> That palter with us in a doube sense,
> That keep the word of promise to our ear
> And break it to our hope.

The Republican majority should have long since reported and passed the Mason bill or a similar one for the relief of Ireland. By so doing it would have followed one of its few worthy traditions.

Let me remind you that Daniel Webster, the great Secretary of State of the Whig Party, the ancestor of the Republican Party, met a situation almost parallel to Ireland's and did not hestitate to act and to proclaim bold, courageous American principles. It was in 1848, in the controversy between the United States and Austria, when Webster declared that Austria could have no grievance if the United States should see fit to recognize the independence of Hungary.

During the revolutionary movement in Hungary President Taylor sent a confidential agent to Vienna to ascertain the progress and probable result of the movement and the true state of affairs by personal observation. Learning of this action, the Austrian Government protested on the ground that it was an interference in the domestic affairs of that empire, disrespectful towards her, and that it was impossible to reconcile such a mission with the principle of nonintervention announced by the United States as the basis of American policy. Objections were made generally against all interference in the internal affairs of the Austrian Government. Austria went so far as to threaten retaliation if this country continued to take an indirect part in the political movements of Europe.

In his reply to the Austrian note Daniel Webster maintained that the steps taken by President Taylor were consistent with the neutral policy which had invariably guided our Government in its foreign relations as well as with the established and settled principles of national intercourse and the doctrine of public law.

In the light of current events it may be interesting to quote Mr. Webster in full. This is taken from the correspondence between him and the Chevalier Hulsemann, chargé d'affaires of his Majesty the Emperor of Austria, and may be found in the writings and speeches of Daniel Webster. Mr. Webster declared:

The Government and people of the United States, like other intelligent governments and communities, take a lively interest in the movements and events of this remarkable age, in whatever part of the world they may be exhibited. But the interest taken by the United States in those events has not proceeded from any disposition to depart from that neutrality toward foreign powers which is among the deepest principles of the most cherished traditions of the political history of the Union. It has been the necessary effect of the unexampled character of the events themselves which could not fail to arrest the attention of the contemporary world, as they will doubtless fill a memorable page in history. But I go further and freely admit that, in proportion as these extraordinary events appeared to have their origin and those great ideas of popular and responsible government, on which the American constitutions themselves are wholly founded, they could not but command the warm sympathy of our people. Well-known circumstances in their history, indeed their whole country, have made them the representatives of purely popular principles of government. In this light they now stand before the world. They could not, if they would, conceal their character, their condition, or their destiny. They could not, if they desired it, suppress either the thoughts or the hopes which rise in men's minds, in other countries, from contemplating their successful example of free government. True, indeed, it is that the prevalence on the other continent of sentiments favorable to republican liberty is the result of the reaction of America upon Europe; and the source and center of this reaction has doubtless been, and now is, in these United States. Certainly the United States may be pardoned, even by those who profess adherence to the principles of absolute government, if they entertain an ardent affection for those popular forms of political organization which have so rapidly advanced their own prosperity and happiness and enabled them to bring their country and the hemisphere to which it belongs to the notice and respectful regard, not to say the admiration, of the civilized world. Nevertheless, the United States have abstained, at all times, from acts of interference with the political changes of Europe. They can not, however, fail to cherish always a lively interest in the fortunes of nations struggling for institutions like their own. But this sympathy, so far from being necessarily a hostile feeling toward any of the parties to these great national struggles, is quite consistent with amicable relations with them all.

The Hungarian people are three or four times as numerous as the inhabitants of the United States were when the American Revolution broke out. They possessed, in a distinct language and in other respects, important elements of a separate nationality which the Anglo-Saxon race in this country did not possess, and if the United States wish success to other countries contending for popular constitutions and national independence, it is only because they regard such constitutions not as imaginary but as real blessings. When the people of the United States behold the people of foreign countries spontaneously moving toward the adoption of institutions like their own, it surely can not be expected of them to remain wholly indifferent spectators.

Mr. Webster then went on to explain that in the year 1848 a number of Hungarians came to the United States, among them individuals representing the revolutionary government, to urge the President to recognize the existence of that government. Mr. Webster continued:

In these applications and in the manner in which they were viewed by the President, there was nothing unusual; still less was there anything unauthorized by the law of nations. It is the right of every independent State to enter into friendly relations with every other independent State. Of course, questions of prudence arise in reference to new States, brought by successful revolutions into the family of nations; but it is not to be required of neutral powers that they should await the recognition of a new government by the parent State. No principle of public law has been more frequently acted upon within the last 30 years by the great powers of the world than this. Within that period 8 or 10 new States have established independent governments within the limits of the colonial dominions of Spain, upon this continent; and in Europe the same thing has been done by Belgium and Greece.

The existence of all these governments was recognized by some of the leading powers of Europe as well as by the United States before it was acknowledged by the States from which they had separated themselves. If, therefore, the United States has gone so far as to acknowledge the independence of Hungary although, as the result has proved, it would have been a precipitate step, and one from which no benefit would have resulted to either party, it would not, nevertheless, have been an act against the law of nations, provided they took no part in her contest with Austria.

In closing his letter Mr. Webster added:

You may be assured that while performing with strict and exact fidelity all their neutral duties, nothing will deter either the Government or the people of the United States in exercising, at their discretion, the rights belonging to them as an independent Nation, and of forming an expression of their own opinion freely, at all times, upon the great political events which may transpire among the civilized nations of the earth. Their own institutions stand upon the broadest principles of civil liberty, and believing those principles and the fundamental law in which they are embodied to be eminently favorable to the prosperity of States, to be, in fact, the only principles of government which meet the demands of the present enlightened age, it may be regarded as certain that our principles and policy will not be abandoned from until some extraordinary change shall take place in the general current of human affairs.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the public-land laws.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the cost of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I obtained unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the Tombigbee River, but I fail to find it in the RECORD and I can not locate the date. I therefore ask unanimous consent again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the Tombigbee River. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana yield a moment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks upon past legislation and pending legislation at this session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, what particular legislation? Does that include the soldiers' bonus?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. No; nothing about the bonus.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when Mr. Herbert Hoover, expatriated American, condescended to come back from the home of his adoption to the land of his birth he brought back a great number of pat and catchy phrases. He came here, as you remember, as the purchasing agent of the Allies. He remained the purchasing agent of the Allies until the close of the war, notwithstanding the fact that during all of the time after we entered the war he was the food conservator of the United States.

Amongst other things, during the war he said that we should save more in order that we might help to feed the Allies. After the war was over he said that we should save more to help feed starving Europe. That was the slogan that went from one end of the country to the other. It is the slogan that is now going from one end of the country to the other. The invention of Mr. Hoover, it has found its place upon every billboard throughout the United States. It has found its place in almost every passenger car on all the railroads throughout the country.

I wish very briefly to call your attention to some of the results of the propaganda instituted by Mr. Hoover, which is now still being promulgated. As a result of this propaganda we find this spectacle presented at this time: That there are millions and millions and millions of pounds of bacon and ham and frozen meat taken away from the United States and from those who need it here for the purpose of feeding people across on the other side of the sea, food that is now being sold, if you please, at a penny a pound to the soap boilers of Europe. That is not all of it. There are millions and millions of pounds in cold storage upon this side awaiting shipping vessels to go over and still further glut the market on the other side. Yet we are told that there is a shortage over there.

I wish to call attention very briefly to some corroboration of the facts that I have just stated. I call your attention to a copy of the Liverpool Daily Post and Mercury of April 27, 1920, and wish very briefly to read you some extracts from that paper. I read:

FOOD MINISTRY PROFITEERING—THE EVILS OF CONTROL—CONCLUDING ARTICLE.

(By Boyd Cable.)

The frozen-meat scandal has been fairly well exposed, and the public know to some extent the appalling waste of good food which has resulted from control, is still resulting, and is going to continue to result.

The cold storage is crammed and packed with meat; ships are arriving every day with more cargoes for which there is absolutely no room; meat is going bad and being sent to the soap-boiling works; and yet the price is held up to an average 9d., at which it does not sell. Meat is being pushed onto the retailers to-day which has been anything up to two years in store; and the excuse for not reducing prices to a level at which the meat might sell and clear the glut is that there is a "world shortage."

Here are some facts of the "world shortage" bogey in the frozen-meat trade. There is more of this meat available for export to-day than ever there was; there is greater frozen storage capacity; there is greater refrigerator steamer capacity. And consumption is much less. In 1913 world production of frozen meat was 767,000 tons. In 1919 it had risen to 1,078,000 tons—nearly 40 per cent increase. Consumption has fallen. In 1913 the consumption in the United Kingdom was 720,000 tons (out of the world's 767,000 tons), but in 1919 we consumed only 500,000 tons.

There is no world shortage of frozen meat; there is not the faintest prospect of a shortage within present-day reckoning of any experts in the trade. The cry of "world shortage" is only useful as an excuse for maintaining high prices.

THE BACON BUNGLE.

The bacon business again has been another horrible example of official muddling and waste. Bacon was decontrolled in March last year. Prices, after decontrol, rose for the good and sufficient reason that the value of the English pound had fallen in American exchange by about a corresponding amount of the increased price of bacon. The ministry took the rising price as an excuse to requisition the arriving supplies and resume control. The price had then risen to 2s. 8d. a pound, and that price, after nearly a year's control, remains to-day. If the private traders were, as the ministry asserted, profiteering at this price of 2s. 8d., is the ministry profiteering to-day at the same price? If the ministry is not profiteering because the fallen value of the English pound maintains the higher price, the same excuse would have held good for the traders.

But under control there has been heavy loss and waste. I know that the ministry blame the bacon going bad on the traders and say it is the requisitioned supplies which are being destroyed. But there are 40,000 boxes of this bacon still in store—bacon seized here last August and which the trade intended to have on the market in a few weeks. Little wonder it is going bad. Only a few days ago the Press reported a case of a box of bacon being issued to the trade bearing the date it went into cold storage—June, 1919. Is it surprising that the imported bacon we are forced to buy is unfit to eat?

MORE STALE BACON TO COME.

The Government have been so harried by complaints of the glut of bacon in the country that they have been restricting imports, and now point proudly to the fact that there is only about three or four weeks' supply in the country. One might imagine from this that in a month from now we shall be getting only fresh imported bacon to eat. The fact is that the bacon is lying in cold storage in America instead of here. There are 450,000 quarter-ton boxes of bacon belonging to the ministry lying in America to-day. So we shall go on eating months-old stale and unpalatable controlled bacon for many months to come.

A few weeks ago a statement was published by the Liverpool Provision Trade Association and the Home and Foreign Produce Exchange, in which they said that in August last, when the Government "commandeered" the supplies, bacon was on the spot and arriving to an extent of about 100,000 tons, at an average price of £185 per ton; and that "thousands of boxes (weighing four to the ton) have been sold by authority of the ministry to soap boilers and others at a loss of about £160 per ton." Other thousands of tons had been sold to the Continent and buyers here for about £45 a ton, and more hundreds of tons were still waiting to be sold and boiled down.

Under private trading bacon importers took their own risks in importing. If the goods did not sell quickly enough, the prices had to be lowered until the bacon sold freely. If the trader was fool enough to hold his stocks until they went bad and had to be sold to the soap boiler, the trader had to pay the loss. Under control we get bacon so inferior and salt-saturated that people will hardly buy it, and if stocks go bad and are condemned as unfit for human food, the taxpayer bears the loss.

RICE PROFITEERING.

Every now and then you may have read nice, plausible paragraphs in the press giving reasons for the rising price of rice—how the crop in this place or that had failed, how freight had risen, and so on. There is a strong suspicion that these paragraphs emanate from the ministry of food's publicity department, and certainly they have never made any mention of other and sounder reasons for the rising price—the profiteering of the ministry, for instance.

In 1918 the Government bought rice from Burma shippers at £8 a ton. Freight, insurance, etc., added, say, £3 10s. a ton, making purchase cost of about £11 10s. a ton. The same rice was sold to the trade at £26 10s. a ton—£15 profit to the Government on its purchase price of £11 10s. The Government is said by those who ought to know to have made £12,000,000 profit on one season's dealing in rice.

Now, the purchase price has risen, and, averaging the price they paid for the old and for the new rice, the Government will be paying about £37 10s. a ton. But the price has been put up to 7d., and the Government is still making about £11 a ton profit.

We are told nowadays that there is going to be a shortage of potatoes, and with the increased price of bread and the relief on the poor-class purse that might have been afforded by the substitution of more potatoes for bread, this is a very serious matter. The shortage can be traced distinctly to the evil effects of past control methods, the waste that resulted, and the unfair dealing of the Government.

During the last shortage the Government urged farmers to grow more potatoes, promising to take these over at a good price, and ordering them to hold them for instructions as to where and when they were to be sold. As a result thousands of tons of potatoes were grown, and the farmers obediently put these in pits and awaited instructions. In many an instance the instructions never came, and when the farmers wrote the ministry, pointing out that the potatoes were likely to go bad unless lifted soon, they were simply told to hold on to the crop and "wait instructions." To cut a long story short, there are thousands of tons of potatoes scattered over the length and breadth of the country rotted in the pits because the ministry would not allow the owners to sell them. In many other cases the ministry took over the potatoes, but have not yet paid the farmer for them, and in the last week or two committees of farmers have been forming to press the ministry for payment of potatoes taken over in 1918 and for others which were never taken over but rotted where they lay because the farmer was forbidden to sell them.

Now, when potatoes are again being controlled and the farmers are being asked to increase their potato crop it is hardly surprising that they turn a deaf ear to the urging, remembering their past treatment. So we are going to be short of potatoes this year, thanks in large part to control. And this time not even the pigs benefited by the control bungle, because the potatoes were left to rot in the pits, and are still there.

SOCIALIST SUPPORT OF CONTROL.

One finds it hard to understand why the Labor Socialists should be doing their utmost to support this system of control and to favor fastening it on the country for another term of years. One explanation is to be found in the craze of a section of the socialists for any form of "nationalization" and State trading at any price. Another apparently is in the desire of the Labor Party to make a profitable alliance with the Cooperative Party, the State buying and selling all food and the cooperatives distributing it—for the sound reason that in the past the "co-ops" have supported strikes by grants of money, by distribution of goods, and by other valuable means. This may be good business for the labor and socialist extremists, and the aim of the cooperative parties may well be to gain the support of the labor vote; but there are many sound members of the societies who view with alarm the swallowing of the co-ops by the socialists and the use of co-op funds to foster and help strikes and spread socialist propaganda, and certainly the public may jib at being made to pay extortionate food prices because of the whims and the aims of either socialist, cooperative, or any other section of the community.

The excuse given by the socialists for backing control is that it is the preventive of private profiteering. I hope I have shown clearly where this is wrong and how control opens doors to retailers profiteering, and how the food ministry is amongst the worst and most voracious of the food profiteers. I have been told that it can not be called profiteering if the Government makes ten millions on sugar or £7 on an £8 case of eggs, because this profit comes back to the country and helps to relieve taxation. It does not. It is relief to no one if dates and bacon and frozen meat go by the hundred and thousand of tons to the manure works, the pigs, and the destructors.

WASTED PROFITS.

Instead of profits coming back to the country, they are wasted in bad and inefficient methods of ministry business ways or swallowed up in the millions spent on salaries and expenses and official "publicity" to persuade the public that control is beneficial, and that the ministry bureaucrats must be kept in their comfortable jobs. And even if the profits come back to the country the principle is unsound and bad, because the public don't know that high food prices are due to Government profiteering, because, as I have shown, control hits hardest the poorer classes, who can't afford high prices, and because by fostering a belief that private traders and retailers are making the high prices and extortionate profits, the workers are being goaded into rebellion, angered beyond forbearance, and spurred harder into the class war that is such a menace to-day.

There are few who will not admit that control was a necessity during the war. There are few (except those whose persons or pockets would suffer by decontrol) who are not convinced that the sooner control is abolished now the better for the public.

Even the belief that control prevents private profiteering is not sufficient excuse for keeping it on food, because it would be perfectly simple to devise and work a scheme cheaply and efficiently whereby control could be kept over profits and traders prevented from making too high prices and profits. The first thing we want to abolish is the system of Government buying and selling of food—buying badly in many cases, handling inefficiently and wastefully, and selling dearly. Until we get rid of the system there can be little hope of lower food prices.

Mr. BLANTON. How is that—45 pounds a ton? Is that pounds sterling?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Now, that is the situation existing to-day, so far as frozen meat and bacon are concerned in England; and notwithstanding that fact we find this in the public press—I cut this out of the Washington Times of Sunday last:

BEEF WAITS SHIPMENT.

PORTLAND, ME., May 30.

Six million pounds of frozen beef will be shipped to Germany and other countries of central Europe on the British steamship Armagh, which arrived here yesterday from Boston on her way to Hamburg. The beef was sent here by western packers.

And what is true with reference to Portland is also true with reference to the millions of pounds that are stored in other cold-storage houses awaiting shipment to Europe.

Now, what is the result? We find here one of the great reasons for the high cost of living, and it is an absolute waste, for the reason that it is benefiting no one. We are sacrificing, to the detriment of the American consumer, the meat of this country to be sent across upon the other side, there to be sold to the soap boilers of Europe.

There is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the committee. We are going to have the greatest shortage of food next year that we have had since long before the war, by reason of the shortage of labor. The great agricultural sections of the West—Iowa, Indiana, and Illinois—will produce from 20 to 25 per cent less cereal products this year than they have produced in the last five years. And what is true of the section I have mentioned is also true throughout the southland, and it is true throughout the northland. There are 18,000 farms in Michigan to-day that are idle because no one can be found to tend them.

With that condition confronting us, what is going to be the result to this country within the next nine months and during the next winter?

And here is another thing to which I wish to call attention: We have this day in every commercial center factories closing by the score for the lack of coal. One of the great universities in Indiana, unless it speedily finds relief, must close down in a very short time because it can not get coal. A gentleman telephoned to me to-day who came all the way from Indiana down to West Virginia to see if he could get coal there, and he told me this is the condition that he found: The proprietors of the coal mines say, "We can not get cars sufficient to satisfy our export trade, but if you will pay us the export price we will see to it that you get a little coal to tide you over," the export price being for smokeless coal from $8 to $12 per ton.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, right there will the distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I heard the distinguished gentleman this morning ask the majority leader whether an opportunity would be given him to go into this question by considering a certain resolution which he had. Is the gentleman going to let it stop there? Is he going to let the women and children of this country freeze to death next winter?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to call attention to the condition that is confronting us and to what the probable result will be; and if I felt that I could get sufficient support I would introduce to-morrow morning into this House a bill putting an embargo upon the shipment of coal out of this country until our domestic demands could be supplied.

Mr. BLANTON. I will give the gentleman one vote on it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am glad to have that much encouragement. The Interstate Commerce Commission tell me that they are powerless to remedy this condition. I asked them whether it was not within their province to say to these coal-mine owners, "You shall not receive cars or have any cars unless you use them to satisfy the domestic demand." The Interstate Commerce Commission say that there is no law authorizing them to put that kind of a condition upon their furnishing these cars. What is the result? We find that every eastern terminal to-day is crowded with cars, all the sidetracks taken up with cars awaiting a chance to ship coal abroad; and I am informed by the Interstate Commerce Commission that when they say to them that the demurrage charge will be enforced against them they simply smile and say, "It will be added to the export price," and they are getting, if you please, $30 a ton for coal in London. That is the condition that is confronting the American people—with our factories closing down and men being thrown out of employment, and with the winter not so far off, contracts for the delivery of coal to fill the bins of the American consumers next winter are being evaded. Where dealers have held off in the hope that there would be a reduction in price they can not get a contract to-day of any character. That is especially true throughout the Northwest, and I am informed that it is equally true throughout the East.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not the gentleman aware that foreign buyers are bidding against American buyers and offering large bonuses?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is not a bit of doubt about it. They are sending checks here in blank to be filled out by the sellers of coal at any price they see fit. So we have this trouble. There is not only a shortage of coal cars in this country, but the miners are taking advantage of that fact, and they say to the domestic buyer, "We can not get the cars," but when they do get the cars then they say to the domestic buyers, "We have not sufficient cars to satisfy our foreign trade, but if you will pay us the export price we will see that you get a little."

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. By way of confirmation of what the gentleman says, I will say that two or three days ago I talked with a gentleman representing the Dutch Government, and he told me that he was buying $2,000,000 worth of coal a month in the United States for use in Holland.

Mr. BLANTON. For the Kaiser to burn?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Take the price of American coal to-day in London, and it is $30 a ton, and these gentlemen, as long as they are permitted without some affirmative law whereby they will be compelled to satisfy domestic trade, will continue to take this export price. So I say that, we being cognizant of the facts, the responsibility is on us.

Somebody says that the President of the United States, in the exercise of his good offices, can call us back if this thing is not relieved in a short time. We all know that the President is in a very precarious condition. God will and I hope he may recover from his affliction, but what his condition may be in a few weeks or months immediately ahead of us none of us can predict.

If he keeps constantly growing worse and gets in that condition where he can not exercise his presidential will, and not being officially disqualified so that the Vice President can act in his stead, the American people will hold the American Congress responsible for this condition that is now confronting us. While we are still in session we should not allow the opportunity to pass without at least placing ourselves in a position whereby we can remedy this situation. It is the American Congress to whom the people of this country are looking for relief, and we will fall short of the duty resting upon us unless we afford some remedy for relief.

What is true of coal is likewise true of provisions and meats, as I have shown you from the article I have read from Mercury.

The trades people of Europe are calling attention to the fact that millions and millions of pounds of beef and various other products are going to waste there and that they are all being brought from the United States in large quantities.

I have told you the facts as I have gleaned them, corroborated by evidence not only on this side as to what is going on but by evidence that comes back to us from the other side, and I dare say that the statement I have read to you you have not seen in a single American paper. The papers that I have in my hand were received from a gentleman just back from the other side, who wondered because these things had not been brought to the attention of the American people. That they are true there is no doubt.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum. We have been here 10 hours and 23 minutes on a stretch.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman withhold that for one more speech?

Mr. BLANTON. I will withdraw the point.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. LUHRING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a review of some legislation I have supported and some work I have done here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, some of you may think that I arise to criticize the speech just made by the gentleman from Indiana, but realizing that Mr. Hoover might be the nominee of the great Republican convention in Chicago next week the only suggestion that I have is that the gentleman do not print his speech condemning Mr. Hoover and the hundreds of thousands of Republicans in this country who want to see Hoover nominated until after the results of that convention have been announced, and then if he is not nominated I assure the gentleman that the Democrats will gladly welcome any criticism of Mr. Hoover and his Republican followers that he and his stand-pat Republican friends see fit to make.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the plea in behalf of the agricultural interests of this country just made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON], and I can not proceed, in the time allotted me to-day, after listening to his discourse and realizing his knowledge of and interest in agriculture, without congratulating the people of his district and those of the United States upon sending him to Congress and of indulging the hope that every man or woman in the United States interested in agriculture will recognize his ability and interest in agriculture and see to it that he is continued as a Member of the United States Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] called attention to the lack of legislation on the part of this Congress in behalf of the postal employees of the country and plead with the Congress for favorable action on a measure looking to their relief before the contemplated adjournment on June 5.

I arise to add my plea in behalf of the faithful, overworked, and underpaid postal employees of the United States Government. It seems to me that this Congress, having been in session practically all the time since May 19, 1919, has had ample time to have taken action on this matter.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Has the gentleman read the bill which has been reported out from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. HOWARD. I have not; but I understand a bill has been reported. But I am also aware of the fact that there are thousands of other bills on the calendar which will not pass, and it is my interest in this bill that causes me to rise and make the plea that I have.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I have read the bill, and it gives a slight increase to postal employees, but in my judgment not a sufficient increase to meet the high cost of living.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware that this Congress has twice increased the pay of postal employees, is he not?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why does the gentleman express surprise that Congress has not paid any attention to their demands?

Mr. HOWARD. Because this increase made for the benefit of our postal employees is only of a temporary nature, and I think the conditions of the service are such that permanent relief should be extended and that postal employees should know, as you and I know, what is going to be their fate in the future.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, the increases that have been made are not temporary.

Mr. HOWARD. I must decline to yield further.

No member of Congress and no citizen of the United States who has given any thought at all to the matter denies but what the postal employees are entitled to relief.

It is a reflection on the Congress that these employees who have been faithful throughout it all have been neglected by this Congress as they have been. I can not see any excuse for this neglect. This Congress has found time to appropriate millions of dollars to settle war claims of wealthy manufacturers and contractors. It has found plenty of time to waste many dollars of the people's money investigating the actions of the administration and our soldiers during the war. It has found time to pass many measures not as meritorious as the claims of these postal employees. It has found time to waste hundreds of pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and many, many hours of time in making political speeches and playing politics, and yet it has been unable to find time to take up and pass measures allowing to these postal employees the justice and equity to which they are entitled.

Our Postal Service is one of the most efficient departments of our Government. It is one of the most necessary departments to the benefit and convenience of the entire people. It has been through the faithfulness of these employees, whose families have been and are suffering by reason of the neglect of this Congress, that this efficiency and convenience has been brought about. They work for us faithfully throughout the day and throughout the night, under any and all circumstances and in any and all weather. It is now contemplated that on Saturday this Congress shall adjourn. Some are to hie themselves away on pleasure trips and foreign junkets; others will spend vacations at the seashore and in the mountains; others of us will content ourselves in our districts working for and urging our own interests. During all this time these faithful employees, still suffering by lack of recognition unless we act at once, will continue to serve us in their well-known faithful manner. And, Mr. Speaker, I urge and plead with this Congress that before the gavel of the Speaker shall finally fall upon this session that we stop long enough to take up and pass some measure extending to these faithful and neglected employees of the Postal Service the equity and justice to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the general deficiency appropriation bill, H. R. 14335, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subjects of Indian legislation and affairs, also inserting a personal statement relative to my service in Congress and on the subject of necessity for legislation regarding peyote or mescale, and in connection therewith to include a short editorial from the Outlook.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

ORDER OF BUSINESS—CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) in accordance with the order heretofore made the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 2, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV a letter from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting report in response to House resolution 501, directing the commission to make immediate inquiry into the cause of the recent advance in the prices of all petroleum products, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11228) to authorize the establishment of a Coast Guard station on the coast of Green Bay, at or in the vicinity of Strawberry Passage, in Door County, Wis., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1074), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3994) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1075), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 533) requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make certain inquiries into the prices of loose-leaf tobacco, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1077), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14119) fixing rates of postage on certain kinds of printed matter, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1078), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WINSLOW, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 311) authorizing the President of the United States to manage and operate Cape Cod Canal, in the State of Massachusetts, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1080), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEENERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14338) to reclassify postmasters and employees of the Postal Service and readjust their salaries and compensation on an equitable basis, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1081), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4435) to authorize officers of the Naval Service to accept offices with compensation and emoluments from Governments of the Republics of South America, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1082), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14148) to correct the military record of A. J. Henry, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1076), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. PETERS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13662) for the relief of Stanley Mitchell, reported the same without amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1085), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McKINLEY: A bill (H. R. 14354) to provide for the alterations for the present post-office building at Champaign, Ill., and for the purchase of additional ground adjoining same; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. LAYTON: A bill (H. R. 14355) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increases of pension in certain cases; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DOMINICK: A bill (H. R. 14356) granting the consent of Congress for the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at or near Sanders Ferry and between the counties of Anderson, S. C., and Elbert, Ga.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. THOMPSON (by request): Resolution (H. Res. 578) authorizing the installation of an electrical mechanical voting machine in the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Accounts.

4057. By Mr. WEBSTER: Petition of numerous residents of the fifth district of Washington, indorsing Senate bill 3259 and House bill 10925, offering the aid of the National Government to the several States in maternal and infant-welfare work; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 2, 1920.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. E. O. Watson, secretary of the Council of the Churches of Christ in America, offered the following prayer:

Our Father and our God, humbly, reverently, with grateful hearts, we bow before Thee; humbly as we think of our unworthiness, reverently as we think of Thy goodness and of Thy glory, gratefully as we think upon Thy loving kindness and tender mercies that have been ever held toward us. We acknowledge Thy hand, our Father, in our individual lives and the destiny of our Nation and of all nations. We pray that Thou wilt guide and bless each one of us as on this new day we come before Thee thanking Thee for life, for liberty, and for service; that Thou wilt guide us, that we may have wisdom to know and grace to respond to the calls of duty, and strength faithfully to discharge every obligation and meet every responsibility in this great day. Bless, we pray Thee, this great body, the Senate of our Nation, its President, and every Senator. Bless our great Nation, and guide us in all things that we may work out our high place to the glory of God and for the blessing of mankind. All this we ask, we humbly ask, in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LEGISLATIVE RECORD—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have just been honored with a copy of what purports to be my legislative record during my service in this body since 1914, bearing the signatures of Samuel Gompers, Frank Morrison, and James O'Connell, executive committee. I shall ask at the end of my comments to place this document in the RECORD. It is too important not to have a place in our proceedings, so that my conduct here may serve as a warning both to my successor, whether Democratic or Republican, and to those of my colleagues whose terms extend over the next Congress. This document is to be read at every meeting of the organizations of the Federation of Labor until election day. I shall therefore receive some publicity between now and the 2d day of November, which is gratifying even though it may prove disagreeable.

This record begins with the 27th day of February, 1915. I presume that date fixes the limitation upon my official misconduct. Consequently offenses preceding that date are lost and forgotten in the oblivion of time.

I am recorded as voting unfavorably on a number of occasions upon the motion to strike out what is called a "vicious" provision prohibiting the stop-watch and bonus system from the military bill. In some instances I am recorded as not voting. I can not understand it. I do not think that Mr. Gompers has treated me fairly. I am entitled to a correct and complete record of all my misdeeds here, and if I at any time failed to vote to strike out what is called the stop-watch and bonus system it should be explained that I was absent from the Chamber at the time or because no record vote was taken. I voted to strike out these provisions upon every opportunity that offered itself, and surely I am entitled to some credit for having myself interposed a motion to strike out on a number of occasions. It is said that everything is fair in love and war, and I am sure Mr. Gompers intends to play the game according to that rule, so that all my misdeeds may receive the publicity to which they are entitled.

Let me proceed. I voted unfavorably once on the Borland amendment increasing the hours of Government employees and I failed to vote once upon it. Here again is a strangely unaccountable hiatus in my unfortunate record. I tried here to get rid of the system which permits some employees to work less than eight hours while others are required to work eight hours and more. I acted upon the assumption that a full day's wage entitled the Government to a full day's service, and I voted accordingly. I shall repeat the vote if given the opportunity. Again, if I failed to vote on the 21st of March, 1918, it is a lapse for which I owe the Senate an explanation. I am accused on the 27th day of August, 1918, of voting unfavorably on the "work-or-fight amendment" to the draft bill. I did vote against striking out the provision, but it is unfair to me not to record the fact that I was the author of that provision. It was I who offered it in the Committee on Military Affairs and it is I who am responsible for it, and I protest, Mr. President, that that fact should appear in this record of condemnation. I entertained the idea that a man relieved from duty at the front because of his need in the manufactures at home ought to work just as hard in the vocation to which he had been assigned as though he were in the trenches. Consequently my amendment was designed to take men who, having been thus detailed, refused or declined to work and put them in the trenches. It was known as the work-or-fight amendment. Mr. Gompers opposed it, to use his expression, viciously. We had quite a spirited correspondence about it. I got the best of the argument, but unfortunately he had the votes. My argument, albeit conclusive, was ineffectual, and Mr. Gompers's argument, however inconclusive, was very triumphant. Hence men relieved from military service and detailed to work in munitions production were permitted to work or shirk as they pleased, while their pay continued in any event.

I could read, if I were so disposed, the RECORD giving the names of the Senators who voted to strike out that provision. Unfortunately some of them have since incurred the displeasure of King Samuel, and are therefore upon his blacklist along with me.

I am sorry for them; I am very, very sorry for them; but "I can not cry for laughing."

Unconsciously, perhaps, these gentlemen have since given offense to Mr. Gompers. Unconsciously they have done things which put them out of favor at court. Unconsciously, perhaps, they have been unmindful of those requirements, the observance of which is absolutely essential to reelection.

So, while the fate now confronting me looms large and disagreeable, I shall have the melancholy pleasure of enjoying the company of a number of my associates here, who then passed under Mr. Gompers's rod, and who next November will have to pass under it again.

I am recorded as casting an unfavorable vote upon the motion to strike out the antistrike clause of the Cummins bill. Upon that I seem to have voted unfavorably three times, but upon the 23d of February, 1920, when the Cummins-Esch railroad bill conference report, containing the obnoxious antilabor and other objectionable provisions was accepted, I am recorded as not voting. I did not; that is a fact. I was not here. Unfortunately I was in New York, engaged in making an antistrike speech. I could not be here and cast my vote in favor of that obnoxious provision and at the same time be addressing an audience in New York in favor of antistrike legislation. Had it been possible for a man of my dimensions to have been at two places on the same date, I should have made my record good upon the last vote that was taken upon that bill, although I did not approve of the conference report. We had not the sand to stand by our convictions and retain the antistrike clauses of the bill, and consequently I was not at all enamored of the conference committee report.

Upon the 3d of April, 1920, that being my last recorded offense, I am charged with voting unfavorably upon the Myers amendment prohibiting the affiliation of Federal employees with organized labor. I did. I voted once since upon the same subject. My recollection is that the only votes favoring the Myers amendment were his and my own. On a subsequent occasion, however, 3 votes for were cast. So we gained 50 per cent; and when it comes up again, as it certainly will, I hope that we will record 4 votes for it, which will be 100 per cent gain. Then, after the election, when it again recurs, as I trust it will, with no election to be held for two years, I hope we will secure a dozen votes for it. That is perhaps a very extravagant anticipation, but I am sometimes overextravagant, generally, however, in a pessimistic way. However, nothing in the world so stiffens the official vertebræ as the fact that an election has just been passed and one will not be confronted with another for two years.

So, if Mr. Gompers, in justice to me, will please amend this record with the explanation which I have made, so that if hung at all I may be hung for an old sheep and not for a lamb, he will for the first time in our pleasant association together place me under lasting obligation.

I ask unanimous consent, although perhaps modesty should suggest that some one else should do so, to print my record in the RECORD. I may add, as suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that it may save others from the disagreeable necessity of making similar requests.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
NATIONAL NONPARTISAN POLITICAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE,
May 13, 1920.

To the secretaries of all local unions and central bodies in Colorado:

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: We are inclosing a copy of the legislative record of Senator CHARLES SPALDING THOMAS, of Colorado, on measures of interest to labor that have come before the United States Senate for a record vote during his membership therein.

Conforming to a suggestion by the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor's national nonpartisan political campaign committee, the unions which have received these labor records of their public officials have adopted the method of reading them at every meeting of their organizations, the object being to keep their members advised continually until election day of the position taken on labor matters by their legislators. We have been advised that this has been a very effective and instructive method of publicity.

Yours, fraternally,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
FRANK MORRISON,
JAMES O'CONNELL,
Executive Committee.

SCHEDULES OF CLAIMS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, schedules of claims amounting to $863,568.91, allowed by the several accounting officers of the Treasury Department under appropriations the balances of which have been exhausted or carried to the surplus fund, etc. (S. Doc. No. 286), which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $500,000 required by the War Department for expenses incident to the settlement of war claims arising out of Ordnance Department contracts (S. Doc. No. 289), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $15,000, required by the Bureau of Education for "Register of Teachers, Bureau of Education," for the remainder of the current fiscal year and to remain available until December 31, 1920 (S. Doc. No. 294), which, with accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for the Public Health Service to be available for expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921 (S. Doc. No. 290), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $5,000 required by the Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year 1921 for necessary expenses to repair damage by typhoon at the Agricultural Experiment Station on the island of Guam (S. Doc. No. 288), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the president of the Civil Service Commission, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $7,500, required by the commission for printing and binding, fiscal year 1920 (S. Doc. No. 291), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $292,000, required by the Treasury Department for expenses incident to the transfer of duties and function of the several subtreasuries when discontinued as provided for by law (S. Doc. No. 292), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $104,050 for general expenses, public buildings, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $35,000, required by the Department of State in connection with foreign intercourse, for the relief and protection of American seamen, fiscal year 1920 (S. Doc. No. 287), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $19,000, required for alterations incidental to discontinuance of the electric generating plant in the State, War, and Navy Building, and to provide for the purchase of electric current for operation of that building during the fiscal year 1921 (S. Doc. No. 293), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6222) to remove a certain tract or lots of lands in Cristobal, Canal Zone, from the operation and effect of the Executive order of the President of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the act of Congress of August 24, 1912 (37 Stats., ch. 390, p. 565).

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4311) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Caribou National Forest.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 406) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California; and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2890. An act to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes;

S. 4411. An act granting the consent of Congress to the counties of Pembina, N. Dak., and Kittson, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North at or near the city of Pembina, N. Dak.;

S. 4431. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Rock River, in Lee County, State of Illinois, at or near the city of Dixon, in said county; and

S. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for the enforcement of the prohibition law in the Philippine Islands, which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented a petition of the General Synod of the Reformed Church of the United States, praying for the ratification of the treaty of peace and the participation by the United States in the League of Nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SPENCER. I present a statement issued by Daniel T. O'Connell, director of the Friends of Irish Freedom, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Daniel T. O'Connell, director, Friends of Irish Freedom, National Bureau of Information, to-day issued the following statement in relation to interruptions of the proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives:

"'The acts of the small group of women who to-day interrupted the proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives are disavowed by those intrusted with the responsibility of guiding the activities of the Americans of Irish blood striving to aid Ireland in establishing her independence. The interruptions were wholly without authority and without the knowledge of any responsible officer or representative of the National Council of the Friends of Irish Freedom or associated organizations.

"'Fair-minded people of America will, I am sure, realize that these women acted as individuals and not in any representative capacity. In view of these circumstances it would seem but proper that the Friends of Irish Freedom as an organized body, representing 20,000,000 of Americans of Irish blood should not be misjudged by the acts referred to and that in the spirit of fairness pending legislation, namely, the Mason resolution, should in no way be affected thereby.'"

Mr. SPENCER. I also present resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Whereas the official records and reports from unimpeachable sources reveal the fact that in 1905 Japan forced the protectorate treaty upon Korea against the wish of the Korean ruler and her people, Korea having been an independent kingdom for 40 centuries, and five years later annexed her as a Province of the Japanese Empire in violation of her treaty stipulations with Korea; and

"Whereas since the annexation Japan has pursued a most oppressive policy in Korea with a view to denationalize the Korean people as a race, Japan has taken the agricultural lands of the Koreans by force and fraudulent methods, Japan has prevented the Koreans from obtaining a higher education, and by arbitrary rules and regulations the Koreans have been hindered from pursuing commercial or industrial activities, thus bringing their condition politically, economically, and educationally to a most pitiful state; and

"Whereas Japan has persistently attempted to check the spread of Christianity in Korea, because Christianity demands a spirit of individual liberty, education, and moral and material improvement among the Korean people; the native Christian leaders have been constantly persecuted on false and foolish charges, and often without any charge, and even the American missionaries have been insulted, maltreated, and imprisoned without just cause; and

"Whereas on March 1, 1919, the united Korean people peacefully declared their independence from Japan, but did not commit any act of violence, but the Japanese soldiers and gendarmes used the most inhuman and barbarous methods in suppressing them; in this brutal treatment of these defenseless people who aspire to be free the Japanese singled out the Christian element of the Korean population, killed them by thousands, tortured them, and incarcerated them in the foulest dungeons for indefinite periods without trial, even women and girls being subjected to the most barbarous treatment; and

"Whereas the Japanese Government endeavored to suppress the news of these outrages for several months by sending out false and misleading official statements, but failed in their attempt; and now the same officials are trying to assuage the just indignation of the civilized world by making various promises of reforms which so far have not been fulfilled, nor have the ruthless methods of repression ceased; and

"Whereas the only remedy for this intolerable condition lies in the withdrawal of Japanese domination from Korea; by removing this fundamental wrong of the strong nation oppressing and exploiting the weak for selfish greed peace will be permanently restored in the world: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the mass meeting of the people of Philadelphia, held on the 23d day of May, 1920, at the Academy of Music, city of Philadelphia, That we strongly protest against Japan's imperialistic policy in Korea, and we urge the Japanese people to persuade their Government to adopt a just and humane course toward their Korean neighbors; be it further

"Resolved, That we sympathize with the Korean people in their hour of struggle for the principle of political and religious freedom, and we admire their firm and uncompromising attitude for their ideals and their abiding faith in the ultimate triumph of righteousness over brute force; be it further

"Resolved, That we request our Government to use its good offices to bring about an amicable adjustment between Japan and Korea in fulfillment of our pledge to Korea in the treaty of 1882 between the United States and Korea; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the President and Senate of the United States.

"Proposed by Joseph M. Steele.

"Meeting was presided by Floyd W. Tomkin."

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Building Trades Council of Contra Costa County, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent gambling in the necessaries of life and speculating in stocks and bonds, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have received a large number of telegrams relating to the coal situation in New England, upon which I submitted some remarks a few days ago. I ask that the telegrams may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LYNN, MASS., June 1, 1920.

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Our industrial interests urge upon you the need for immediate action on bituminous-coal situation. Export through Virginia ports, which we depend upon for our major supply by water, are far above normal, resulting in New England movement so small that hand-to-mouth existence is now necessary. If wheels of industry are to be kept moving next winter, now is the time we must accumulate reserve supply, which must come by water, as railroads never have, and in our judgment can not, move enough bituminous coal to supply New England needs. We believe temporary embargo on foreign shipments only solution of problem.

LYNN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

BOSTON, MASS., May 29, 1920.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Supplementing information which you already have with respect to the present deplorable and ruinous coal prices. Eastern Massachusetts Street Railway Co., operating over 800 miles of street railway, under direction of five public trustees in the interest of preserving transportation facilities at reasonable rates throughout the greater part of eastern Massachusetts, is now compelled to pay $15.25 per ton for tidewater bituminous coal, with assurances that price will advance to $16 next week. Under all known facts as to the fair and profitable cost, including Shipping Board water and rail rates, price should not exceed $8.75 per ton. We are unable to obtain any reasonably firm price contracts and are compelled to buy coal at arbitrary and at prohibitive prices to keep our 10 power plants running. This company uses thousands of tons per annum. Coal bunkers are practically empty. Fifteen to sixteen dollar coal will add $1,000,000 per year to operating expenses, which are now so inflated that many miles of track on this system, serving thousands of citizens, must be shut down if these prices continue. We can not too strongly support all the statements you have made as to this shameful coal situation, and are ready to urge our complaint with evidence when and where the same will be of value.

R. B. STEARNS,
Vice President and General Manager Eastern Massachusetts Street Railway Co., by direction of Public Trustees.

SALEM, MASS., May 29, 1920.

Senator D. I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our board commends and thanks you for coal embargo resolution.

R. A. GODDARD,
Secretary Salem Chamber of Commerce.

LEE, MASS., May 29, 1920.

DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We urge immediate passage of bill prohibiting exportation of coal. New England industries, including ourselves, are closing down, due to inability to get coal. Prices here trebled, and coal is impossible to secure.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have received a copy of a resolution passed unanimously by the South Carolina executive committee of the American Legion, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, S. C., May 29, 1920.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith is a copy of a resolution passed unanimously by the South Carolina executive committee of the American Legion.

Yours, very truly, JULIUS H. WALKER,
State Commander.

"Whereas it appears from statements made by Dr. W. C. Rucker, chief medical adviser of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and other Government officers, that 641,900 men were discharged from the Army and Navy with disabilities, of whom 276,327 were seriously disabled, and that less than 5 per cent of the disabled have been cared for by the Federal Board of Vocational Education; and

"Whereas it is estimated by qualified experts that the proper and adequate care of those who have been disabled may cost the Government annually from $325,000,000 to $500,000,000: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the executive committee of the American Legion of South Carolina, That we strongly condemn any legislation designed to give a cash bonus to the able-bodied ex-service men at this time, when it appears that no adequate provision has been made for the disabled, who are really entitled to assistance; and

"That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Representative in the United States Senate and Congress and published in the State newspapers."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received from Irvine F. Belser, of Columbia, S. C., relative to the soldiers' bonus bill now before Congress. I ask to have the letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MELTON & BELSER.
Columbia, S. C., May 29, 1920.

Senator E. D. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty of calling your attention to a matter which vitally affects the soldier bonus bill now before Congress.

Dr. W. C. Rucker, chief medical adviser of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, in a recent statement says that 641,900 men were discharged from the service for disability, of whom 276,327 were seriously disabled, and that less than 5 per cent of these men have been cared for by the Federal Board. Also it is estimated by Dr. Rucker and others qualified that the proper care of these wounded and disabled will cost the Government annually from $325,000,000 to $500,000,000.

Regardless of how much it should cost, the disabled are certainly entitled to preferential treatment over the able-bodied; and there must be some limit to taxation. For this and other reasons I urge you to vote and use your influence against the proposed blanket bonus bill now before Congress.

I am writing this letter simply as a citizen and taxpayer of the United States and as an ex-service man who spent 20 of the most valuable months of his life in the Army. I trust that we can count on the South Carolina Representatives to take a statesmanlike view of the matter.

Yours, very truly, IRVINE F. BELSER.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRANCE, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to which was referred the bill (S. 3259) for the public protection of maternity and infancy and providing a method of cooperation between the Government of the United States and the several States, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 650) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 4357) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, Army and Navy nurses (male and female), and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 651) thereon.

Mr. FRANCE. For the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 13627) to amend paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6407) for the relief of Michael MacGarvey, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 649) thereon.

JAMES L. VAI.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 2673) entitled "A bill for the relief of James L. Vai," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 4479) authorizing the Postmaster General to cancel or readjust the screen-wagon contract of Thomas A., Henry P., and Joseph F. Eagan, and the parcel-post and collection-wagon contract of the estate of Thomas Eagan; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. SMITH of Georgia:

A bill (S. 4480) granting a pension to Sadie Judith Tharp (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4482) to provide for the addition of certain public lands to the Lewis and Clark National Forest in Montana; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4483) for the relief of the Lambert Transportation Co. (Inc.); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4484) granting an increase of pension to Mary B. Graham; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 4485) to enlarge the area of lands authorized to be taken for the reclamation of the Anacostia River Flats; to the Committee on the Library.

BUREAU OF SUPPLY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I introduce the bill which I send to the desk, in order that it may be printed and the subject discussed and studied during the recess.

It provides for the creation of a central purchasing bureau for the purchase of Government supplies, and is intended to systematize the purchase of supplies, and to avoid the present extensive duplication that exists, and to bring about a more orderly and economical system of purchasing supplies.

The bill (S. 4481) to establish in the District of Columbia a Government bureau of supply, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $19,084.59 for continuing the extension of the quay wall at the navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MYERS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $9,819 to pay Katherine Macdonald, of Butte, Mont., for work and services performed on or supplies furnished for the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORRIS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $117,735.31 for the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Omaha Tribe of Indians against the United States, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 2265, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

WALTER B. HENRETTY.

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 381), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay out of the appropriation for expenses of inquiries and investigations, contingent fund of the Senate, to Walter B. Henretty the sum of $1,208.33 for clerical services rendered the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs appointed to investigate the question of awards in the Navy under authority of Senate resolution of June 6, 1919.

FOREST RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CAPPER. Yesterday there was received a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture relative to timber depletion, lumber prices, lumber exports, and concentration of timber ownership, which was in response to a resolution submitted by me on February 21, 1920. The Chair ordered the communication and accompanying papers to lie on the table. I move that the communication and accompanying papers be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND IN CALIFORNIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to amendment No. 7 of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 406) amending an act entitled "An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the city of Los Angeles, Calif., certain public lands in California, and granting rights in, over, and through the Sierra Forest Reserve, the Santa Barbara Forest Reserve, and the San Gabriel Timberland Reserve, Calif., to the city of Los Angeles, Calif.," approved June 30, 1906, which was, in Senate amendment No. 7, line 1, after "page," to strike out "5" and insert "6."

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. SMOOT. I am positive that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] notified the chairman of the committee that he would desire to speak upon the conference report.

Mr. THOMAS. That being the case, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gerry	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hale	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Henderson	Nugent	Smoot
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thomas
Culberson	Keyes	Page	Underwood
Curtis	King	Pittman	Wadsworth
Dial	Lodge	Robinson	Warren
Dillingham	McCormick	Sheppard	Wolcott
Elkins	McCumber	Simmons
Fernald	McLean	Smith, Ariz.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GAY, Mr. KNOX, Mr. NELSON, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. TRAMMELL, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. NEW, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. EDGE, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. ASHURST, and Mr. HARDING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are engaged on the business of the Senate in connection with an investigating committee.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I realize that at this late time it is practically impossible to remedy a defect in the pending naval appropriation bill which involves the abandonment of a policy followed heretofore for many years. When the naval appropriation bill came over from the House I found that no appropriation had been made for carrying on the work of the torpedo station at Newport, R. I. I suggested to the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate an amendment appropriating $200,000 for that station, which would have afforded an adequate amount to carry on their work for the next fiscal year. The committee agreed to my amendment, as did also the Senate, but when the bill went to conference the House conferees objected, I understand, on the ground that the necessary amount could be obtained from the general appropriation for ordnance and ordnance stores. They insisted on disagreeing to the amendment, and the Senate conferees, to insure the passage of the naval appropriation bill at this session, finally yielded.

I have no fault to find with the Senate conferees, for I know they did all they could to maintain my amendment in the bill. Mr. President, the Senate was right in inserting this amendment, and for this reason: The work of the naval torpedo station at Newport is of the most important character. With the development of the submarine, with the increased number of destroyers we have lately built, and with the lessons we have learned in the war, there can be no question that the torpedo is becoming a more and more important weapon of naval attack; and I am proud to say that the American torpedo is probably the best in the world.

That such is the case is due to the efficiency and the ability of not only our naval experts but of the men in the torpedo station. The Newport torpedo station has been in existence for something like 50 years; there has been built up a skilled, able, and loyal personnel. Its record before the war was excellent and during the war it was magnificent. The employees take a pride in their work, and the results prove their great efficiency.

I do not believe, therefore, Mr. President, that it is a wise policy in any way to curtail or cut down such an important appropriation as the one to which I refer. The argument that it is covered, as I have said, by the general appropriation for ordnance and ordnance stores, I do not think is sound. Admiral Earle, when he came before the committee, asked for $20,000,000. The House Naval Affairs Committee considered that sum too great, and they cut the appropriation down to $17,500,000. Admiral Earle's first estimate was conservative, and it was a mistake, in my judgment, to cut down the appropriation $2,500,000, for it may mean the curtailing to a considerable extent of naval endeavors which should be carried on.

I am an advocate of economy, but I do not believe that it is possible always wisely to economize by cutting down appropriations. Sometimes that is false economy. A good example of this was the failure of this Congress to provide increased pay for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and the Coast and Geodetic Survey last fall, and delaying action until late this spring, because of a cry of economy, with the result that the Navy lost between 70,000 and 80,000 of its most efficient men.

I trust and believe that the department will see that no injury is done to the station at Newport. I know that the Secretary of the Navy is interested in it and will do what he can to see that it is carried on in its present efficiency, but I do not believe that Congress should allow any department to decide how little is to be spent in such a vital naval matter. It was for that reason that I offered the amendment in the Senate Naval Affairs Committee, which was adopted by the Senate, and it is for that reason that I am protesting now against the action of the conferees in not sustaining the Senate contention.

As I said before, however, I realize that at a time like this, at the end of the session, it is practically impossible to rectify an injury of this sort, and all that I can do is to voice my protest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

TEMPORARY RED CROSS BUILDINGS.

Mr. FERNALD. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 200) to grant authority to continue the use of the temporary buildings of the American Red Cross headquarters in the city of Washington, D. C., and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, let the joint resolution be read first.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas by joint resolution of Congress approved the 22d day of May, 1917, authority was granted to the American National Red Cross to erect temporary structures upon square No. 172 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government, provided said buildings erected under said authority should be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within three years from the date of said resolution; and

Whereas the buildings erected pursuant to said resolution are still needed for use in connection with its work in cooperation with the United States Government: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That authority be and is hereby given to the central committee of the American National Red Cross to continue the use of such temporary buildings as are now erected upon square 172 in the city of Washington, for the use of the American Red Cross in connection with its work in cooperation with the Government of the United States: Provided, That any building or buildings, the use of which is extended under this authority, shall be removed and the site or sites thereof placed in good condition within three years from the date of the approval of this resolution, unless otherwise especially provided by Congress: Provided further, That the United States shall be put to no expense of any kind by reason of the exercise of the authority hereby conferred.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Maine to explain in detail, if he will, the reasons for the passage of the legislation.

Mr. FERNALD. The explanation is simply this:

Three years ago authority was given to the American Red Cross Association to erect some buildings in the rear of the Red Cross building, and those buildings were built largely by charity. They cost in the neighborhood of $300,000. The time has expired within which they should be removed, but the buildings are still in use, and they ask that the time may be extended for another three years. They ask for no appropriation, but simply for an extension of the time that the buildings may remain on this lot. I understand that there is no objection from any source.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether or not there is any provision now upon the statute books in regard to the time when these buildings are to be removed and at whose expense?

Mr. FERNALD. It is so stated in the joint resolution.

Mr. KING. No; the joint resolution states, as I understand, that they may be removed. There is nothing in the joint resolution to require their removal.

Mr. FERNALD. The purpose of the joint resolution is simply to extend the time under the same law, and to say that they may remain there for another three years.

Mr. KING. But is it the purpose of the Senator to keep these buildings in their present situation for three years?

Mr. FERNALD. Not unless it is necessary. That, I assume, would be left to the Red Cross Association.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to my colleague that the joint resolution is mandatory, for it provides that these buildings shall be removed, and the site or sites thereof shall be placed in good condition, within three years. So it is left entirely to the judgment of the Red Cross officials as to whether they shall be removed within a year or two years, but not to exceed three years. At the end of three years the joint resolution says they shall be removed.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Maine whether or not the Government, prior to the expiration of the three-year period of limitation, might remove the buildings if the Government required the land?

Mr. FERNALD. I should think they might.

Mr. KING. Will any expense be devolved upon the Government in the maintenance of these buildings?

Mr. FERNALD. Not at all.

Mr. KING. Nothing for insurance?

Mr. FERNALD. Not at all, as I understand.

Mr. KING. Are there no Government officials in charge of the buildings?

Mr. FERNALD. I think not.

Mr. KING. But the entire cost of the maintenance of the buildings will be met by the Red Cross organization?

Mr. FERNALD. Yes; I assume so.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not there are any employees of the Government who are engaged in service in these buildings?

Mr. FERNALD. I do not know about that. I think they are used entirely by the Red Cross Association.

Mr. KING. The reason why I am making the inquiry is that I have been told that in some quasi public organizations now, organizations which ought to be conducted entirely by private individuals or by corporations, Government employees give their services at the cost of the Government.

Mr. FERNALD. My understanding is that the Government has no employees in this Red Cross work.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, out of order I present a conference report on the merchant-marine bill, and ask that it may lie on the table until action is taken by the House.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question in regard to the conference report. As I understand it, the Senator simply wishes to have the conference report printed, and intends to ask to have it taken up, and it will be taken up, by unanimous consent?

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand it, under the rule I can not ask that it be taken up until it is acted upon by the House. When the House has informed the Senate that it has acted upon the report I shall ask that it be taken up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. When the conference report is taken up, will it be taken up under unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to inform the Senator from New Jersey what action the Senate will take respecting the conference report. The Senator from Washington merely asks that it lie on the table for the present, and it is in the province of the Senate to determine when it will proceed to the consideration of the conference report. There is no request whatever pending for the consideration of the report. So the Chair can not tell the Senator from New Jersey what action the Senate may hereafter take in regard to the report.

Mr. NELSON. I suppose the conference report can be taken up at the proper time either by unanimous consent or on motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly. Any Senator can make a request for unanimous consent to consider the report, and if that is not secured he may at the proper time move to consider the report. The Senator from New Jersey must appreciate the fact that the Chair can not anticipate what the Senate may do in the matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I submit the report, and ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 35, 44, 47, 49, 122, 125, and 149.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 43, 45, 46, 50, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 78, 80, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 140, 143, and 148, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: ", in this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: ", and shall have authority to adjust, settle, and liquidate all agreements, express or implied, on a fair and equitable basis"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 3. (a) That section 3 of the 'Shipping act, 1916,' is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. That a board is hereby created to be known as the United States Shipping Board and hereinafter referred to as the board. The board shall be composed of seven commissioners, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the President shall designate the member to act as chairman of the board, and the board may elect one of its members as vice chairman. Such commissioners shall be appointed as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act and shall continue in office two for a term of one year, and the remaining five for terms of two, three, four, five and six years, respectively, from the date of their appointment, the term of each to be designated by the President, but their successors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that any person chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he succeeds.

"'The commissioners shall be appointed with due regard to their fitness for the efficient discharge of the duties imposed on them by this act, and two shall be appointed from the States touching the Pacific Ocean, two from the States touching the Atlantic Ocean, one from the States touching the Gulf of Mexico, one from the States touching the Great Lakes, and one from the interior, but not more than one shall be appointed from the same State. Not more than four of the commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party. A vacancy in the board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments. No commissioner shall take any part in the consideration or decision of any claim or particular controversy in which he has a pecuniary interest.

"'Each commissioner shall devote his time to the duties of his office, and shall not be in the employ of or hold any official relation to any common carrier or other person subject to this act, nor while holding such office acquire any stock or bonds thereof or become pecuniarily interested in any such carrier.

"'The duties of the board may be so divided that under its supervision the directorship of various activities may be assigned to one or more commissioners. Any commissioner may be removed by the President for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance in office. A vacancy in the board shall not impair the right of the remaining members of the board to exercise all its powers. The board shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

"'The board may adopt rules and regulations in regard to its procedure and the conduct of its business. The board may employ within the limits of appropriations made therefor by Congress such attorneys as it finds necessary for proper legal service to the board in the conduct of its work, or for proper representation of the public interest in investigations made by it or proceedings pending before it whether at the board's own instance or upon complaint, or to appear for or represent the board in any case in court or other tribunal. The board shall have such other rights and perform such other duties not inconsistent with the merchant marine act, 1920, as are conferred by existing law upon the board in existence at the time this section as amended takes effect.

"'The commissioners in office at the time this section as amended takes effect shall hold office until all the commissioners provided for in this section as amended are appointed and qualify.'

"(b) The first sentence of section 4 of the 'Shipping act, 1916,' is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 4. That each member of the board shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: " : Provided, That all vessels assigned to river and harbor work or inland waterways, and vessels now in the course of construction or under contract by the War Department or the Navy Department, shall be exempt from the provisions of this act"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisement and due advertisement, to"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "existing freight rates and prospects of their maintenance,"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and any other facts or conditions that would influence a prudent, solvent business man in the sale of similar vessels or property which he is not forced to sell"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "not inconsistent with the provisions of section 5 (except that completion of the payment of the purchase price and interest shall not be deferred more than 10 years after the making of the contract of sale)"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: " ; but no such sale shall be made unless the board, after diligent effort, has been unable to sell, in accordance with the terms and conditions of section 5, such vessels to persons citizens of the United States, and has, upon an affirmative vote of not less than five of its members, spread upon the minutes of the board, determined to make such sale; and it shall make as a part of its records a full statement of its reasons for making such sale. Deferred payments of purchase price of vessels under this section shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 5½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 6 and 7 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the following words: "Where adequate terminal connections with rail carriers can and will be made or already exist"; in line 17 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "of the United States" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Referred to in section 4 of this act or otherwise acquired by the board"; in line 30 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment, after the word "authorized," insert the following: "Notwithstanding the act entitled 'An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' approved March 3, 1891"; at the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment change the period to a colon and add the following: "And provided further, That whenever the board shall determine, as provided in this act, that trade conditions warrant the establishment of a service or additional service under Government administration where a service is already being given by persons, citizens of the United States, the rates and charges for such Government service shall not be less than the cost thereof, including a proper interest and depreciation charge on the value of Government vessels and equipment employed therein"; in line 8 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment after the word "world," insert the words "and domestic"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment, after the word "board," insert a comma and the following: "in cooperation with the Secretary of War"; in line 6 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment, after the word "rail," insert a comma and the word "water"; omit the proviso at the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That if after such investigation the board shall be of the opinion that rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations or practices of common carriers by railroad subject to the interstate commerce act are detrimental to the object declared in this section, or that new rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations or practices, new or additional port terminal facilities, or action on the part of such common carriers by railroad are or any of them is necessary or desirable to promote such declared object, the board may file its application or complaint with the Interstate Commerce Commission praying for such relief and order as the commission may deem proper under the law then existing. In connection with such application or complaint the board may submit to the commission its findings together with the record or records on which they are based and the commission is hereby empowered to issue such order or orders relative thereto as it may deem proper without further investigation, but the commission may augment or supplement the record or records submitted to it by the board by such further investigation as the commission deems appropriate"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu "$25,000,000"; in line 21 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out everything after the word "built," down to and including the word "semiannually," at the end of the matter proposed by such Senate amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 79, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair and until"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "pursuant to the policy and purposes declared in sections 1 and 5 of this act; and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall continue in existence and have authority to operate vessels, unless otherwise directed by law, until all vessels are sold in accordance with the provisions of this act, the provision"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 120, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 17. That the board is authorized and directed to take over on January 1, 1921, the possession and control of, and to maintain and develop, all docks, piers, warehouses, wharves and terminal equipment and facilities, including all leasehold easements, rights of way, riparian rights and other rights, estates and interests therein or appurtenant thereto, acquired by the President by or under the act entitled 'An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved March 28, 1918.

"The possession and control of such other docks, piers, warehouses, wharves and terminal equipment and facilities or parts thereof, including all leasehold easements, rights of way, riparian rights and other rights, estates or interests therein or appurtenant thereto which were acquired by the War Department or the Navy Department for military or naval purposes during the war emergency may be transferred by the President to the board whenever the President deems such transfer to be for the best interests of the United States.

"The President may at any time he deems it necessary, by order setting out the need therefor and fixing the period of such need, permit or transfer the possession and control of any part of the property taken over by or transferred to the board under this section to the War Department or the Navy Department for their needs, and when in the opinion of the President such need therefor ceases the possession and control of such property shall revert to the board. None of such property shall be sold except as may be hereafter provided by law."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 121, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 12 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment after the word "chartered" at the end of the line preceding and the beginning of said line 12 insert the words "by the board"; in lieu of the last two paragraphs of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"It shall be unlawful to sell, transfer or mortgage, or, except under regulations prescribed by the board, to charter, any vessel purchased from the board or documented under the laws of the United States to any person not a citizen of the United States, or to put the same under a foreign registry or flag, without first obtaining the board's approval.

"Any vessel chartered, sold, transferred or mortgaged to a person not a citizen of the United States or placed under a foreign registry or flag, or operated, in violation of any provision of this section shall be forfeited to the United States, and whoever violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine of not more than $5,000, or to imprisonment for not more than five years, or both."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 123, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 19. (1) The board is authorized and directed in aid of the accomplishment of the purposes of this act (a) to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act;

"(b) To make rules and regulations affecting shipping in the foreign trade not in conflict with law in order to adjust or meet general or special conditions unfavorable to shipping in the foreign trade, whether in any particular trade or upon any particular route or in commerce generally and which arise out of or result from foreign laws, rules or regulations or from competitive methods or practices employed by owners, operators, agents, or masters of vessels of a foreign country; and

"(c) To request the head of any department, board, bureau, or agency of the Government to suspend, modify, or annul rules or regulations which have been established by such department, board, bureau, or agency, or to make new rules or regulations affecting shipping in the foreign trade other than such rules or regulations relating to the Public Health Service, the Consular Service, and the Steamboat-Inspection Service.

"(2) No rule or regulation shall hereafter be established by any department, board, bureau, or agency of the Government which affect shipping in the foreign trade, except rules or regulations affecting the Public Health Service, the Consular Service, and the Steamboat-Inspection Service, until such rule or regulation has been submitted to the board for its approval and final action has been taken thereon by the board or the President.

"(3) Whenever the head of any department, board, bureau, or agency of the Government refuses to suspend, modify, or annul any rule or regulation, or make a new rule or regulation upon request of the board, as provided in subdivision (c) of paragraph (1) of this section, or objects to the decision of the board in respect to the approval of any rule or regulation, as provided in paragraph (2) of this section, either the board or the head of the department, board, bureau, or agency which has established or is attempting to establish the rule or regulation in question may submit the facts to the President, who is hereby authorized to establish or suspend, modify, or annul such rule or regulation.

"(4) No rule or regulation shall be established which in any manner gives vessels owned by the United States any preference or favor over those vessels documented under the laws of the United States and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 124, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 20. (1) That section 14 of the shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 14. That no common carrier by water shall, directly or indirectly, in respect to the transportation by water of passengers or property between a port of a State, Territory, District, or possession of the United States and any other such port or a port of a foreign country,—

"'First. Pay, or allow, or enter into any combination, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, to pay or allow, a deferred rebate to any shipper. The term "deferred rebate" in this act means a return of any portion of the freight money by a carrier to any shipper as a consideration for the giving of all or any portion of his shipments to the same or any other carrier, or for any other purpose, the payment of which is deferred beyond the completion of the service for which it is paid, and is made only if, during both the period for which computed and the period of deferment, the shipper has complied with the terms of the rebate agreement or arrangement.

"'Second. Use a fighting ship either separately or in conjunction with any other carrier, through agreement or otherwise. The term "fighting ship" in this act means a vessel used in a particular trade by a carrier or group of carriers for the purpose of excluding, preventing or reducing competition by driving another carrier out of said trade.

"'Third. Retaliate against any shipper by refusing, or threatening to refuse, space accommodations when such are available, or resort to other discriminating or unfair methods, because such shipper has patronized any other carrier or has filed a complaint charging unfair treatment, or for any other reason.

"'Fourth. Make any unfair or unjustly discriminatory contract with any shipper based on the volume of freight offered, or unfairly treat or unjustly discriminate against any shipper in the matter of (a) cargo space accommodations or other facilities, due regard being had for the proper loading of the vessel and the available tonnage; (b) the loading and landing of freight in proper condition; or (c) the adjustment and settlement of claims.

"'Any carrier who violates any provision of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000 for each offense.'

"(2) The shipping act, 1916, as amended, is amended by inserting after section 14 a new section to read as follows:

"'SEC. 14a. The board upon its own initiative may, or upon complaint shall, after due notice to all parties in interest and hearing, determine whether any person, not a citizen of the United States and engaged in transportation by water of passengers or property—

"'(1) Has violated any provision of section 14, or

"'(2) Is a party to any combination, agreement, or understanding, express or implied, that involves in respect to transportation of passengers or property between foreign ports, deferred rebates or any other unfair practice designated in section 14, and that excludes from admission upon equal terms with all other parties thereto, a common carrier by water which is a citizen of the United States and which has applied for such admission.

"'If the board determines that any such person has violated any such provision or is a party to any such combination, agreement, or understanding, the board shall thereupon certify such fact to the Secretary of Commerce. The Secretary shall thereafter refuse such person the right of entry for any ship owned or operated by him or by any carrier directly or indirectly controlled by him, into any port of the United States, or any Territory, District, or possession thereof, until the board certifies that the violation has ceased or such combination, agreement, or understanding has been terminated.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 126, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 1 and 2 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "one year from the enactment of this act" and insert in lieu "February 1, 1922"; in line 11 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "within a year" and insert the words "by February 1, 1922"; at the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment change the period to a colon and insert the following: "And provided further, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall not take effect with reference to the Philippine Islands until the President of the United States after a full investigation of the local needs and conditions shall, by proclamation, declare that an adequate shipping service has been established as herein provided and fix a date for the going into effect of the same"; in line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 23" and insert in lieu "Sec. 21"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 127 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 10 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the word "wholly"; in line 13 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the word "wholly"; in line 15 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "wholly in American" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in such" and after the word "ownership" in said line 15 insert the following: "Subject to the rules and regulations of such trade: Provided, That the board is authorized to issue permits for the carrying of passengers in foreign ships if it deems it necessary so to do, operating between the Territory of Hawaii and the Pacific coast up to February 1, 1922"; in line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 24" and insert in lieu "Sec. 22"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 128, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 23. That the revenue act of 1918 is amended by inserting after section 206, a new section to read as follows:

"'SEC. 207. (a) That the owner of a vessel registered, enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States and operated only in foreign trade shall for each of the 10 taxable years while so operated, beginning with the taxable year 1920, be allowed as a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining his net income subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed by Title III an amount equivalent to the net earnings of such vessel during such taxable year, determined in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the United States Shipping Board. Such owner shall not be entitled to such deduction unless during such taxable year he invested, or set aside under rules and regulations to be made by such board in a fund (to be known as a "replacement fund") for investment, in the building in shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by such board, an amount to be determined by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, and certified by him to such board, equivalent to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable by such owner on account of the net earnings of such vessels but for the deduction allowed under the provisions of this section; but at least two-thirds of the cost of any new vessel so constructed shall be paid for out of the ordinary funds or capital of the person having such vessel constructed.

"'The "invested capital" of the taxpayer attributable to any vessel, the net income from which is exempt from the taxes imposed by Title III shall be regarded as an "inadmissible asset" in computing the taxes due under such title upon the remainder of the taxpayer's net income for the taxable year.

"'(b) After January 1, 1920, upon the sale of a vessel registered, enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States and built prior to January 1, 1914, the vendor may upon application, under oath made in such form as the commissioner shall by regulation prescribe, establish a fund to be known as a "replacement fund." The vendor shall cover into such fund the entire amount received from the sale of such vessel in excess of its value on March 1, 1913, or its cost if acquired on or after that date. Such fund shall be used exclusively for the building by the vendor in shipyards in the United States of a new vessel of a type approved by the United States Shipping Board.

"'Upon the completion of the new vessel it shall not be valued in the accounts of the taxpayer at an amount in excess of that at which the vessel sold was carried in such account at the time of the sale, except and to the extent that the productive capacity of such new vessel is greater than that of such old vessel.

"'(c) Accounting for gain or loss upon the entire amount placed in the fund under the provision of paragraphs (a) or (b) may be deferred for a reasonable period of time to be determined in each case by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary. If the new vessel is built within the time so determined, the moneys in the fund provided for (1) under paragraph (a) shall not be subject to the taxes imposed by Title III, and (2) under paragraph (b) shall not be subject to the taxes imposed in Titles II and III.

"'(d) The taxpayer shall be required to furnish a bond with such security or surety as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall require for an amount not less than the estimated income, war-profits, and excess-profits taxes not paid upon the income so covered into the replacement fund. In lieu of such bond the taxpayer may at his option deposit as security for such estimated amount of taxes, obligations of the United States to be held in trust as such security in a bank or trust company designated by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

"'(e) In case a new vessel is not built within the time determined under this section, the taxes imposed (1) by Title III for the taxable year upon the amount set aside in such year under the provisions of paragraph (a), and (2) by Titles II and III for the taxable year in which the vessel built prior to January 1, 1914, was sold, shall be immediately due and payable, but no penalty or interest shall be added with respect to the time which has elapsed between the time that such taxes would have been due, but for the provisions of this section and the due date.

"'(f) The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, or a majority thereof, are hereby authorized and directed to determine from time to time what shall be allowed for annual depreciation of vessels documented under the laws of the United States engaged in foreign trade and owned by persons citizens of the United States, in order that the owners of such vessels shall be put as nearly as may be on a parity for taxation purposes with the owners of vessels under the flag of our foreign competitors in the world's carrying trade, and such allowances shall be embraced in the deductions allowed by law in determining the net income subject to income taxes and war-profits and excess-profits taxes.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 129, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Nothing herein shall be affected by the act entitled 'An act to provide for ocean-mail service between the United States and foreign ports, and to promote commerce,' approved March 3, 1891"; in line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 26" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 24"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 130, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Beginning in line 6 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment, strike out everything after the word "shipping" down to and including "citizens," in line 9 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment; in lines 10 and 11 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "or such approved organization"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 131, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixteen"; between the first and second paragraphs of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert a separate paragraph as follows:

"The privilege bestowed by this section on vessels of the United States shall be extended in so far as the foreign trade is concerned to the cargo vessels of any nation which allows the like privilege to cargo vessels of the United States in trades not restricted to vessels under its own flag."

In line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 28" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 26."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 8 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the word "wholly," and in line 11 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the figures "24" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "22"; at the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: ": Provided, That this section shall not apply to merchandise transported between points within the continental United States, excluding Alaska, over through routes heretofore or hereafter recognized by the Interstate Commerce Commission for which routes rate tariffs have been or shall hereafter be filed with said commission when such routes are in part over Canadian rail lines and their own or other connecting water facilities: Provided further, That this section shall not become effective upon the Yukon River until the Alaska Railroad shall be completed and the Shipping Board shall find that proper facilities will be furnished for transportation by persons citizens of the United States for properly handling the traffic"; in line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 29" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 27"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 133, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 17 and 18 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out ", and owned by persons who are citizens of the United States"; in line 22 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "and owned"; in line 30 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may"; in line 1 of the proposed amendment strike out the numerals "30" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "28"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 134, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 29. (a) That whenever used in this section—

"(1) The term 'association' means any association, exchange, pool, combination, or other arrangement for concerted action; and

"(2) The term 'marine insurance companies' means any persons, companies, or associations authorized to write marine insurance or reinsurance under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof.

"(b) Nothing contained in the 'antitrust laws' as designated in section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes,' approved October 15, 1914, shall be construed as declaring illegal an association entered into by marine insurance companies for the following purposes: To transact a marine insurance and reinsurance business in the United States and in foreign countries and to reinsure or otherwise apportion among its membership the risks undertaken by such association or any of the component members."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 135, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 30. SUBSEC. A. That this section may be cited as the 'Ship mortgage act, 1920.'

"DEFINITIONS.

"SUBSEC. B. When used in this section—

"(1) The term 'document' includes registry and enrollment and license;

"(2) The term 'documented' means registered or enrolled or licensed under the laws of the United States, whether permanently or temporarily;

"(3) The term 'port of documentation' means the port at which the vessel is documented in accordance with law;

"(4) The term 'vessel of the United States' means any vessel documented under the laws of the United States and such vessel shall be held to continue to be so documented until its documents are surrendered with the approval of the board; and

"(5) The term 'mortgagee,' in the case of a mortgage involving a trust deed and a bond issue thereunder, means the trustee designated in such deed.

"RECORDING OF SALES, CONVEYANCES, AND MORTGAGES OF VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"SUBSEC. C. (a) No sale, conveyance, or mortgage which, at the time such sale, conveyance, or mortgage is made, includes a vessel of the United States, or any portion thereof, as the whole or any part of the property sold, conveyed, or mortgaged shall be valid, in respect to such vessel, against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heir or devisee, and a person having actual notice thereof, until such bill of sale, conveyance, or mortgage is recorded in the office of the collector of customs of the port of documentation of such vessel, as provided in subdivision (b) of this subsection.

"(b) Such collector of customs shall record bills of sale, conveyances, and mortgages, delivered to him, in the order of their reception, in books to be kept for that purpose and indexed to show—

"(1) The name of the vessel;

"(2) The names of the parties to the sale, conveyance, or mortgage;

"(3) The time and date of reception of the instrument;

"(4) The interest in the vessel so sold, conveyed, or mortgaged; and

"(5) The amount and date of maturity of the mortgage.

"SUBSEC. D. (a) A valid mortgage which, at the time it is made includes the whole of any vessel of the United States of 200 gross tons and upward, shall in addition have, in respect to such vessel and as of the date of the compliance with all the provisions of this subdivision, the preferred status given by the provisions of subsection M, if—

"(1) The mortgage is indorsed upon the vessel's documents in accordance with the provisions of this section;

"(2) The mortgage is recorded as provided in subsection C, together with the time and date when the mortgage is so indorsed;

"(3) An affidavit is filed with the record of such mortgage to the effect that the mortgage is made in good faith and without any design to hinder, delay, or defraud any existing or future creditor of the mortgagor or any lienor of the mortgaged vessel;

"(4) The mortgage does not stipulate that the mortgagee waives the preferred status thereof; and

"(5) The mortgagee is a citizen of the United States.

"(b) Any mortgage which complies in respect to any vessel with the conditions enumerated in this subsection is hereafter in this section called a 'preferred mortgage' as to such vessel.

"(c) There shall be indorsed upon the documents of a vessel covered by a preferred mortgage—

"(1) The names of the mortgagor and mortgagee;

"(2) The time and date the indorsement is made;

"(3) The amount and date of maturity of the mortgage; and

"(4) Any amount required to be indorsed by the provisions of subdivisions (e) or (f) of this subsection.

"(d) Such indorsement shall be made (1) by the collector of customs of the port of documentation of the mortgaged vessel, or (2) by the collector of customs of any port in which the vessel is found, if such collector is directed to make the indorsement by the collector of customs of the port of documentation; and no clearance shall be issued to the vessel until such indorsement is made. The collector of customs of the port of documentation shall give such direction by wire or letter at the request of the mortgagee and upon the tender of the cost of communication of such direction. Whenever any new document is issued for the vessel, such indorsement shall be transferred to and indorsed upon the new document by the collector of customs.

"(e) A mortgage which includes property other than a vessel shall not be held a preferred mortgage unless the mortgage provides for the separate discharge of such property by the payment of a specified portion of the mortgage indebtedness. If a preferred mortgage so provides for the separate discharge, the amount of the portion of such payment shall be indorsed upon the documents of the vessel.

"(f) If a preferred mortgage includes more than one vessel and provides for the separate discharge of each vessel by the payment of a portion of the mortgage indebtedness, the amount of such portion of such payment shall be indorsed upon the documents of the vessel. In case such mortgage does not provide for the separate discharge of a vessel and the vessel is to be sold upon the order of a district court of the United States in a suit in rem in admiralty, the court shall determine the portion of the mortgage indebtedness increased by 20 per cent (1) which, in the opinion of the court, the approximate value of the vessel bears to the approximate value of all the vessels covered by the mortgage, and (2) upon the payment of which the vessel shall be discharged from the mortgage.

"SUBSEC. E. The collector of customs upon the recording of a preferred mortgage shall deliver two certified copies thereof to the mortgagor who shall place, and use due diligence to retain, one copy on board the mortgaged vessel and cause such copy and the documents of the vessel to be exhibited by the master to any person having business with the vessel, which may give rise to a maritime lien upon the vessel or to the sale, conveyance, or mortgage thereof. The master of the vessel shall, upon the request of any such person, exhibit to him the documents of the vessel and the copy of any preferred mortgage of the vessel placed on board thereof.

"SUBSEC. F. The mortgagor (1) shall, upon request of the mortgagee, disclose in writing to him prior to the execution of any preferred mortgage, the existence of any maritime lien, prior mortgage, or other obligation or liability upon the vessel to be mortgaged, that is known to the mortgagor, and (2), without the consent of the mortgagee, shall not incur, after the execution of such mortgage and before the mortgagee has had a reasonable time in which to record the mortgage and have indorsements in respect thereto made upon the documents of the vessel, any contractual obligation creating a lien upon the vessel other than a lien for wages of stevedores when employed directly by the owner, operator, master, ship's husband, or agent of the vessel, for wages of the crew of the vessel, for general average, or for salvage, including contract salvage, in respect to the vessel.

"SUBSEC. G. (a) The collector of customs of the port of documentation shall, upon the request of any person, record notice of his claim of a lien upon a vessel covered by a preferred mortgage, together with the nature, date of creation, and amount of the lien, and the name and address of the person. Any person who has caused notice of his claim of lien to be so recorded shall, upon a discharge in whole or in part of the indebtedness, forthwith file with the collector of customs a certificate of such discharge. The collector of customs shall thereupon record the certificate.

"(b) The mortagor, upon a discharge in whole or in part of the mortgage indebtedness, shall forthwith file with the collector of customs for the port of documentation of the vessel, a certificate of such discharge. Such collector of customs shall thereupon record the certificate. In case of a vessel covered by a preferred mortgage, the collector of customs at the port of documentation shall (1) indorse upon the documents of the vessel, or direct the collector of customs at any port in which the vessel is found, to so indorse, the fact of such discharge, and (2) shall deny clearance to the vessel until such indorsement is made.

"SUBSEC. H. (a) No bill of sale, conveyance, or mortgage shall be recorded unless it states the interest of the grantor or mortgagor in the vessel, and the interest so sold, conveyed, or mortgaged.

"(b) No bill of sale, conveyance, mortgage, notice of claim of lien, or certificate of discharge thereof, shall be recorded unless previously acknowledged before a notary public or other officer authorized by a law of the United States, or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof, to take acknowledgment of deeds.

"(c) In case of a change in the port of documentation of a vessel of the United States, no bill of sale, conveyance, or mortgage shall be recorded at the new port of documentation unless there is furnished to the collector of customs of such port, together with the copy of the bill of sale, conveyance, or mortgage to be recorded, a certified copy of the record of the vessel at the former port of documentation furnished by the collector of such port. The collector of customs at the new port of documentation is authorized and directed to record such certified copy.

"(d) A preferred mortgage may bear such rate of interest as is agreed by the parties thereto.

"SUBSEC. I. Each collector of customs shall permit records made under the provisions of this section to be inspected during office hours, under such reasonable regulations as the collector may establish. Upon the request of any person the collector of customs shall furnish him from the records of the collector's office (1) a certificate setting forth the names of the owners of any vessel, the interest held by each owner, and the material facts as to any bill of sale or conveyance of, any mortgage covering, or any lien or other incumbrance upon, a specified vessel, (2) a certified copy of any bill of sale, conveyance, mortgage, notice of claim of lien, or certificate of discharge in respect to such vessel, or (3) a certified copy as required by subdivision (c) of subsection H. The collector of customs shall collect a fee for any bill of sale, conveyance, or mortgage recorded, or any certificate or certified copy furnished, by him, in the amount of 20 cents a folio with a minimum charge of $1. All such fees shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

"PENALTIES.

"SUBSEC. J. (a) If the master of the vessel willfully fails to exhibit the documents of the vessel or the copy of any preferred mortgage thereof, as required by subsection E, the board of local inspectors of vessels having jurisdiction of the license of the master, may suspend or cancel such license, subject to the provisions of 'An act to provide for appeals from decision of boards of local inspectors of vessels and for other purposes,' approved June 10, 1918.

"(b) A mortgagor who, with intent to defraud, violates any provision of subsection F, and if the mortgagor is a corporation or association, the president or other principal executive officer of the corporation or association, shall upon conviction thereof be held guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than 1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both. The mortgaged indebtedness shall thereupon become immediately due and payable at the election of the mortgagee.

"(c) If any person enters into any contract secured by, or upon the credit of, a vessel of the United States covered by a preferred mortgage, and suffers pecuniary loss by reason of the failure of the collector of customs, or any officer, employee, or agent thereof, properly to perform any duty required of the collector under the provisions of this section, the collector of customs shall be liable to such person for damages in the amount of such loss. If any such person is caused any such loss by reason of the failure of the mortgagor, or master of the mortgaged vessel, or any officer, employee, or agent thereof, to comply with any provision of subsection E or F or to file an affidavit as required by subdivision (a) of subsection D, correct in each particular thereof, the mortgagor shall be liable to such person for damages in the amount of such loss. The district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction (but not to the exclusion of the courts of the several States, Territories, Districts, or possessions) of suits for the recovery of such damages, irrespective of the amount involved in the suit or the citizenship of the parties thereto. Such suit shall be begun by personal service upon the defendant within the limits of the district. Upon judgment for the plaintiff in any such suit, the court shall include in the judgment an additional amount for costs of the action and a reasonable counsel's fee, to be fixed by the court.

"FORECLOSURE OF PREFERRED MORTGAGES.

"SUBSEC. K. A preferred mortgage shall constitute a lien upon the mortgaged vessel in the amount of the outstanding mortgage indebtedness secured by such vessel. Upon the default of any term or condition of the mortgage, such lien may be enforced by the mortgagee by suit in rem in admiralty. Original jurisdiction of all such suits is granted to the district courts of the United States exclusively. In addition to any notice by publication, actual notice of the commencement of any such suit shall be given by the libellant, in such manner as the court shall direct, to (1) the master, other ranking officer, or caretaker of the vessel, and (2) any person who has recorded a notice of claim of an undischarged lien upon the vessel, as provided in subsection G, unless after search by the libellant satisfactory to the court, such mortgagor, master, other ranking officer, caretaker, or claimant is not found within the United States. Failure to give notice to any such person, as required by this subsection, shall not constitute a jurisdictional defect; but the libellant shall be liable to such person for damages in the amount of his interest in the vessel terminated by the suit. Suit in personam for the recovery of such damages may be brought in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (c) of subsection J.

"SUBSEC. L. In any suit in rem in admiralty for the enforcement of the preferred mortgage lien, the court may appoint a receiver and, in its discretion, authorize the receiver to operate the mortgaged vessel. The marshal may be authorized and directed by the court to take possession of the mortgaged vessel notwithstanding the fact that the vessel is in the possession or under the control of any person claiming a possessory common-law lien.

"SUBSEC. M. (a) When used hereinafter in this section, the term 'preferred maritime lien' means (1) a lien arising prior in time to the recording and indorsement of a preferred mortgage in accordance with the provisions of this section; or (2) a lien for damages arising out of tort, for wages of a stevedore when employed directly by the owner, operator, master, ship's husband, or agent of the vessel, for wages of the crew of the vessel, for general average, and for salvage, including contract salvage.

"(b) Upon the sale of any mortgaged vessel by order of a district court of the United States in any suit in rem in admiralty for the enforcement of a preferred mortgage lien thereon, all preexisting claims in the vessel, including any possessory common-law lien of which a lienor is deprived under the provisions of subsection L shall be held terminated and shall thereafter attach, in like amount and in accordance with their respective priorities, to the proceeds of the sale; except that the preferred mortgage lien shall have priority over all claims against the vessel, except (1) preferred maritime liens, and (2) expenses and fees allowed and costs taxed, by the court.

"SUBSEC. N. (a) Upon the default of any term or condition of a preferred mortgage upon a vessel, the mortgagee may, in addition to all other remedies granted by this section, bring suit in personam in admiralty in a district court of the United States, against the mortgagor for the amount of the outstanding mortgage indebtedness secured by such vessel or any deficiency in the full payment thereof.

"(b) This section shall not be construed, in the case of a mortgage covering, in addition to vessels, realty or personalty other than vessels, or both, to authorize the enforcement by suit in rem in admiralty of the rights of the mortgagee in respect to such realty or personalty other than vessels.

"TRANSFERS OF MORTGAGED VESSELS AND ASSIGNMENT OF VESSEL MORTGAGES.

"SUBSEC. O. (a) The documents of a vessel of the United States covered by a preferred mortgage may not be surrendered (except in the case of the forfeiture of the vessel or its sale by the order of any court of the United States or any foreign country) without the approval of the board. The board shall refuse such approval unless the mortgagee consents to such surrender.

"(b) The interest of the mortgagee in a vessel of the United States covered by a mortgage shall not be terminated by the forfeiture of the vessel for a violation of any law of the United States, unless the mortgagee authorized, consented, or conspired to effect the illegal act, failure, or omission which constituted such violation.

"(c) Upon the sale of any vessel of the United States covered by a preferred mortgage, by order of a district court of the United States in any suit in rem in admiralty for the enforcement of a maritime lien other than a preferred maritime lien, the vessel shall be sold free from all preexisting claims thereon; but the court shall, upon the request of the mortgagee, the libellant, or any intervenor, require the purchaser at such sale to give and the mortgagor to accept a new mortgage of the vessel for the balance of the term of the original mortgage. The conditions of such new mortgage shall be the same, so far as practicable, as those of the original mortgage and shall be subject to the approval of the court. If such new mortgage is given, the mortgagee shall not be paid from the proceeds of the sale and the amount payable as the purchase price shall be held diminished in the amount of the new mortgage indebtedness.

"(d) No rights under a mortgage of a vessel of the United States shall be assigned to any person not a citizen of the United States without the approval of the board. Any assignment in violation of any provision of this section shall be void.

"(e) No vessel of the United States shall be sold by order of a district court of the United States in any suit in rem in admiralty to any person not a citizen of the United States.

"MARITIME LIENS FOR NECESSARIES.

"SUBSEC. P. Any person furnishing repairs, supplies, towage, use of dry dock or marine railway, or other necessaries, to any vessel, whether foreign or domestic, upon the order of the owner of such vessel, or of a person authorized by the owner, shall have a maritime lien on the vessel, which may be enforced by suit in rem, and it shall not be necessary to allege or prove that credit was given to the vessel.

"SUBSEC. Q. The following persons shall be presumed to have authority from the owner to procure repairs, supplies, towage, use of dry dock or marine railway, and other necessaries for the vessel: The managing owner, ship's husband, master, or any person to whom the management of the vessel at the port of supply is intrusted. No person tortiously or unlawfully in possession or charge of a vessel shall have authority to bind the vessel.

"SUBSEC. R. The officers and agents of a vessel specified in subsection Q shall be taken to include such officers and agents when appointed by a charterer, by an owner pro hac vice, or by an agreed purchaser in possession of the vessel; but nothing in this section shall be construed to confer a lien when the furnisher knew, or by exercise of reasonable diligence could have ascertained, that because of the terms of a charter party, agreement for sale of the vessel, or for any other reason, the person ordering the repairs, supplies, or other necessaries was without authority to bind the vessel therefor.

"SUBSEC. S. Nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the furnisher of repairs, supplies, towage, use of dry dock or marine railway, or other necessaries, or the mortgagee, from waiving his right to a lien, or in the case of a preferred mortgage lien, to the preferred status of such lien, at any time, by agreement or otherwise; and this section shall not be construed to affect the rules of law now existing in regard to (1) the right to proceed against the vessel for advances, (2) laches in the enforcement of liens upon vessels, (3) the right to proceed in personam, (4) the rank of preferred maritime liens among themselves, or (5) priorities between maritime liens and mortgages, other than preferred mortgages, upon vessels of the United States.

"SUBSEC. T. This section shall supersede the provisions of all State statutes conferring liens on vessels, in so far as such statutes purport to create rights of action to be enforced by suits in rem in admiralty against vessels for repairs, supplies, towage, use of dry dock or marine railway, and other necessaries.

"MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

"SUBSEC. U. This section shall not apply (1) to any existing mortgage, or (2) to any mortgage hereafter placed on any vessel now under an existing mortgage, so long as such existing mortgage remains undischarged.

"SUBSEC. V. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized and directed to furnish collectors of customs with all necessary books and records, and with certificates of registry and of enrollment and license in such form as provides for the making of all indorsements thereon required by this section.

"SUBSEC. W. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to make such regulations, in respect to the recording and indorsing of mortgages covering vessels of the United States, as he deems necessary to the efficient execution of the provisions of this section.

"SUBSEC. X. Sections 4192 to 4196, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, and the act entitled 'An act relating to liens on vessels for repairs, supplies, or other necessaries,' approved June 23, 1910, are repealed. This section, however, so far as not inconsistent with any of the provisions of law so repealed, shall be held a reenactment of such repealed law, and any right or obligation based upon any provision of such law and accruing prior to such repeal, may be prosecuted in the same manner and to the same effect as if this act had not been passed."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 136, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out "Sec. 33" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 31." In lines 8 and 9 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the words "or take in fuel"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 137, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the figure "11" and insert in lieu the figure "10" and change the section number from "34" to "32"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 138, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 33. That the requirements provided in section 14 of the act entitled 'An act to promote the welfare of American seamen in the merchant marine of the United States; to abolish arrest and imprisonment as a penalty for desertion and to secure the abrogation of treaty provisions in relation thereto; and to promote safety at sea,' approved March 4, 1915, to be observed on the Great Lakes in the intervals from May 15 to September 15, inclusive, and from September 15 to May 15, inclusive, shall be required to be observed instead in the intervals from May 1 to October 15, inclusive, and from October 15 to May 1, inclusive, respectively."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 139, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "Jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located"; in line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment, strike out the section number "36" and insert in lieu thereof the number "34"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 141, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "36"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 142, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "specifically"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 144, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment strike out the section number "39" and insert in lieu thereof the number "37"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 145, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment change the period to a semicolon and add the following: "the term 'board' means the United States Shipping Board; and the term 'alien' means any person not a citizen of the United States"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 146, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 39. That section 2 of the shipping act, 1916, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 2. (a) That within the meaning of this act no corporation, partnership, or association shall be deemed a citizen of the United States unless the controlling interest therein is owned by citizens of the United States, and, in the case of a corporation, unless its president and managing directors are citizens of the United States and the corporation itself is organized under the laws of the United States or of a State, Territory, District, or possession thereof; but in the case of a corporation, association, or partnership operating any vessel in the coastwise trade the amount of interest required to be owned by citizens of the United States shall be 75 per cent.

"'(b) The controlling interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to a majority of the stock thereof is not vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if the majority of the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if through any contract or understanding it is so arranged that the majority of the voting power may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or (d) if by any other means whatsoever control of the corporation is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States.

"'(c) Seventy-five per cent of the interest in a corporation shall not be deemed to be owned by citizens of the United States (a) if the title to 75 per cent of its stock is not vested in such citizens free from any trust or fiduciary obligation in favor of any person not a citizen of the United States; or (b) if 75 per cent of the voting power in such corporation is not vested in citizens of the United States; or (c) if, through any contract or understanding it is so arranged that more than 25 per cent of the voting power in such corporation may be exercised, directly or indirectly, in behalf of any person who is not a citizen of the United States; or (d) if by any other means whatsoever control of any interest in the corporation in excess of 25 per cent is conferred upon or permitted to be exercised by any person who is not a citizen of the United States.

"'(d) The provisions of this act shall apply to receivers and trustees of all persons to whom the act applies, and to the successors or assignees of such persons.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 147, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "40"; and the Senate agree to the same.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the sundry civil appropriation conference report is on the table, and I ask unanimous consent to take it up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the sundry civil appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The Reading Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 5, 11, 14, 27, 36, 37, 38, 42, 43, 47, 50, 52, 54, 56, 62, 63, 71, 79, 80, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 97, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 118, 119, and 124.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 5½, 6, 8, 10, 13, 15, 16, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 33, 35, 39, 41, 45, 46, 48, 49, 51, 55, 58, 61, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 81, 83, 86, 87, 88, 89, 100, 101, 102, 108, 109, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 121, 125, and 126, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"The Lighthouse Service shall cooperate with the Coast Guard in marking anchorage grounds in the harbors of New York and Hampton Roads by furnishing and maintaining buoys necessary for such purposes. Appropriations for the Lighthouse Service for the fiscal year 1921 are made available therefor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 1 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the word "to"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$11,300,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$1,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

"To carry out the provisions of section 13 of the act entitled 'An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes,' approved May 22, 1920, including personal services in the District of Columbia, stationery, printing, purchase of books, office equipment and other supplies, $50,000, of which sum $4,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,740 per annum except one at $2,000 and four at $1,800 each."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "except that there may be employed during the fiscal year 1921, in addition to this limitation, employees at annual rates of compensation as follows: One at not to exceed $6,500, 1 at not to exceed $5,000, 2 at not to exceed $4,000 each, 10 at not to exceed $3,500 each, 10 at not to exceed $3,250 each, and 10 at not to exceed $3,000 each"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 26, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 9 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out the following: "not to exceed $7"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$183,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 32, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$150,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$250,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Medical and surgical history of the war with Germany: Toward the preparation for publication under the direction of the Secretary of War of a medical and surgical history of the war with Germany, including printing and binding at the Government Printing Office and the necessary engravings and illustrations, $50,000: Provided, That the total cost of such history shall not exceed $150,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 44, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 12 of the matter inserted by said amendment strike out "$4,436,297.60" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,000,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 53, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"BUREAU OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee in regard to the amendment which I offered in the Senate, and which was adopted, striking out the proviso with reference to the appropriation which is, I think, amendment numbered 60 of the Senate. As the matter appeared in the bill in the first instance, after the appropriation, it said:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of the costs thereof.

This was stricken out in the Senate. I should like a statement on the part of the chairman of the committee as to why this amendment was receded from.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, the Senator does not expect me to allege a particular reason why that particular amendment was stricken out as apart from all the other amendments. That was not the case. I was entirely agreeable to its going in, and sought to protect it in conference; but we met very sturdy opposition from the other side, and in the final settlement of the bill we were compelled to recede from that amendment, with some others, in this case with an amendment, as we did in many other cases, believing that we had at least approached as near the Senator's wish as we could and get the consent of the House. It was because of no neglect on the part of the conferees of the Senate, and it was with no joy, of course, that we were compelled to recede from any of the amendments; but that, with others, we were unable to retain in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know just what the rules of conferences are with reference to stating the specific objections which the House conferees had to the amendment. I do not know whether that is proper or not; but I am at a loss to know what argument could be advanced for retaining this proviso.

As I stated when the matter was before the Senate, the subject matter covered by the proviso is now in litigation. It is a matter of contention between the water users and the Government, and it has been taken into the courts. This proviso is in effect passing judgment upon that question in controversy, and the judgment is being rendered without any hearing upon the part of the water users. In other words, it deprives them of an opportunity of presenting their view of the matter before the Congress—in effect says that "you must do what the Government has asked you to do."

The matter arises out of a controversy over the items of expense with reference to a certain irrigation project which have been charged up to the water users, they contending that a number of the items of expense, constituting a large portion of the expenditure, ought not to be charged, under the reclamation law, to the water users.

As I said, the matter has gone into the courts. The question of the organization of the district depends alone upon the settlement of it within the courts, and yet the Congress has declared that the appropriation for drainage purposes shall not be used until the district is organized, which is in effect declaring that judgment is rendered against the contention of the water users.

As I said, I do not know why that should be insisted upon by the House, and I should like to know if I am permitted to know?

Mr. WARREN. There is no secrecy about it. May I ask if the addition which the conferees believed would take care of the situation, as nearly as it could be taken care of—that is, that there should be no prejudice on account of this appropriation, and that the finding of the court should, of course, prevail—relieve the situation more than it would have been relieved by striking this out and not including anything?

Mr. BORAH. I do not see, Mr. President, that the second proviso really changes the effect of the first proviso. It reads:

Provided further, That the foregoing proviso shall not be construed as an expression of opinion by the Congress upon the litigation pending between the Government and the settlers of such project or in any manner prejudice such litigation.

But, Mr. President, the effect of saying that the money shall not be used until the irrigation district is formed is to declare that the water users must surrender and organize the district before they can get the benefit of the bill. So, notwithstanding the proviso that it shall not be considered to prejudice, it really does prejudice it. It is like striking a man in the face and then saying that you did not intend any insult or any injury to him; although I have no doubt that this proviso was added in the utmost good faith upon the part of the representatives of the Senate. But the fact is that as a legal proposition it does not save the effect of the first proviso. I dislike very much, Mr. President, to see that kind of a judgment rendered. It seems to me its injustice must be apparent to all.

I think the House conferees understood, probably, that unless this first proviso was in the bill there would be no method by which to get back the money which was appropriated for drainage purposes; but that is not true. The water users are responsible for the amount which would be charged to their separate lands, respectively, for all the money which would be used for drainage purposes. The contention is over the question of organizing the district and making them responsible collectively as a district organization, and in order to organize the district they must agree upon the contract between them and the Government, and they can not agree upon the contract until the items which go into the contract have been settled by the court.

So the result of it is, Mr. President, that Congress is really passing judgment upon this contention, and doing so under such conditions that they will practically, in my judgment, have to abandon the contention, or else get no benefit from this appropriation at all. I urge the injustice of such a proceeding. These people should be heard before the committee. Only one side has been heard.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I trust the conference report on the sundry civil bill will not be agreed to, for the reasons advanced by my colleague.

When that bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Appropriations it contained, on page 106, an item appropriating certain sums of money for the Boise reclamation project, and there was incorporated in it the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of the costs thereof.

When the bill was considered by the Senate my colleague moved as an amendment to strike out the proviso just read, and that amendment was accepted by the chairman of the committee. In conference, however, the proviso was again incorporated in the item. I believe it is absolutely unfair; I think it is not right or proper that it should remain there, and I am opposed to the acceptance by the Senate of the conference report for that reason.

The Boise project, Mr. President, is one of the largest in the United States. It is one of the garden spots of the United States. It contains approximately 265,000 acres of land. About 124,000 are under canals owned by the Government, and the remainder is in irrigation districts or is being supplied with water from canals the owners of which acquired water rights in the Boise River long prior to the time the Reclamation Service commenced operations in that section.

In 1906 the Reclamation Service commenced the irrigation of irrigated land in the Boise project. In 1915 the Arrow Lake dam was completed, at a cost to the Government of approximately four and a third million dollars. It is 349 feet in height, the second highest dam in the United States.

Last year, of the entire project, 216,348 acres were harvested and the crops produced on that acreage were of the value of $14,458,453.62. The land lying under the Government canals was supplied with water by the Government, as was also about 38 per cent of the other land in the project, and the total value of the crops produced last year on land irrigated with water supplied by the Government was $9,372,252.62.

There are more than 3,900 farms within the project, with a population of more than 15,000. There are also 10 towns, with a population of 40,000, or a total population of 55,000.

There are 24 public schoolhouses; 54 churches; 15 banks, with a capital stock of more than $2,000,000, with deposits aggregating $13,500,000, and 28,000 depositors.

Those people, Mr. President, are entitled to an absolutely fair, square deal at the hands of the Congress, and I have not the least doubt in the world that the Congress will accord it to them in the event the Members are familiar with all the facts and circumstances connected with this matter.

So far as I am concerned, I have no personal knowledge of the facts relative to the controversy in which the settlers on the project, or, rather, certain of them, are now involved with the Reclamation Service, but I am in receipt of a copy of certain preambles and resolutions which were adopted by the water users at a meeting held recently, from which I quote the following:

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior * * * did, on July 2, 1917, issue and promulgate a "public notice" violative of the terms of said contract and violative of the laws of the United States; and

Whereas said public notice was based upon and prepared from false and fraudulent data supplied and furnished to said Secretary of the Interior by said D. W. Cole, project manager of the Boise project and other officers of the Reclamation Service under his direction, and said Arthur Powell Davis; and

Whereas said Arthur Powell Davis and the project managers of the Boise project and the local counsel for said project have for a great many years, to wit, more than 10 years, used their official position unlawfully, arbitrarily, and oppressively to influence, induce, and to force the stockholders of the Payette-Boise Water Users' Association to abandon said association and to refuse to pay the assessments levied against their stock and to form and establish an irrigation district instead, and to abandon and surrender their established rights under said contract of February 13, 1906; and

Whereas the settlers under said Boise project have, through their proper officers, requested of said reclamation officials a copy of the proposed contract which would be acceptable in case an irrigation district should be formed, and said officials have persistently refused to furnish such copy or to guarantee the preservation of the rights as provided in the existing contract.

It appears from these resolutions that prior to the time of the organization of the Water Users' Association under the laws of the State of Idaho the then Secretary of the Interior requested that such organization be formed, and it was organized in accordance with his request. It also appears that the constitution and by-laws of the association were submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and that a contract was actually entered into, executed in 1906, under which the settlers have from that day to the present time been operating.

It further appears from the resolutions that every effort has been made during the past several years to induce the settlers to abandon the contracts under which they have established rights and to organize an irrigation district under the laws of Idaho; and it is stated that the Director of the Reclamation Service has persistently and insistently demanded that the settlers take such action; and that they have, as they say, requested that a copy of the contract they will be called upon to enter into with the Government, in the event they organize an irrigation district, be submitted to them, and that it has never been submitted for their consideration.

As was said by my colleague, the matters in dispute between the water users and the Reclamation Service are in litigation, and have been for a number of years. The settlers, who are members of the Water Users' Association, are litigating their rights in a court of justice. The suit, if my recollection serves me right, has been pending for more than a year—possibly two years—and the questions in controversy are now before the Federal court for the district of Idaho for determination. I earnestly insist that they should be settled by the courts, and not by this Congress. So far as the Congress as a whole is concerned, it has no knowledge concerning the facts connected with this matter, and it follows, as a matter of course, that it has no knowledge of the law applicable to those facts. Therefore, how can it decide the questions that are at issue?

Mr. President, I deny that the Congress has any right to in any way, shape, or form determine the question of the validity or invalidity of the contracts now in litigation, and I challenge the right of the Congress to condemn, either directly or indirectly, 10,000 of the people of my State without affording them an opportunity to be heard, and upon the absolutely uncorroborated statement of one man, namely, the Director of the Reclamation Service.

I reside at Boise and have resided there for many years. I know this project, and I know the people who reside on it, and I am proud to say that they will compare most favorably with an equal number of citizens in any other section of the country. They are good Americans. They are honest, industrious, hard-working people, and in the event the court determines the suit now pending adversely to them they will pay every dollar that may be assessed against them.

Again I say that they are entitled as of right to a square deal, they are entitled to fair treatment at the hands of the Congress, and in order to accord them that square deal and such fair treatment the conference report should be rejected and other conferees should be appointed on behalf of the Senate, and they should be instructed to insist on the Senate amendment striking out the proviso which I have read.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. NUGENT. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator think that the proviso added by the conferees would save the legal situation?

Mr. NUGENT. Not at all. While I do not believe for a single solitary moment that the proviso would have the slightest effect on the mind of Judge Dietrich, the judge of the court in which these controverted matters are pending, at the same time it may have the effect of placing the 10,000 water users in an awkward position in the minds of other people. In other words, other people may assume, because of the proviso, that the Congress of the United States has held that the settlers are wrong in their contentions, and that they are seeking to defraud the Government of the United States of money which they owe to it, which is not true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have listened with no little sympathy to the statement of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] on this item in the conference report under consideration. We have trouble with the Reclamation Service in our State. I have followed them with a sincere desire to accept their views with respect to this, but I must confess I am at an entire loss to understand the point which they make in connection with the matter.

As I understand the matter, the water users' association was organized and was necessary by reason of the fact that much of the land under the reclamation project was without any private ownership, and an agreement was entered into with that association under which the association agreed to reimburse the Government for whatever expense it incurred in the construction of the irrigation plant, the ordinary contract entered into with water users' associations. Now, a controversy arises as to how much should be paid to the Government of the United States—that is to say, how much the thing actually did cost—it being contended, as I suppose, that items had been incorporated in the total charge not properly chargeable against these particular water users; and that controversy as to how much should be paid apparently is pending before the Federal courts in the State of Idaho.

Now comes on an application for a further appropriation for the project, to be used for the purpose of drainage, and now the Reclamation Service does not care to bring that appropriation under the contract by which the cost was to be reimbursed through the water users' association, and insists that that shall be taken care of under an irrigation district organization. In other words, the Reclamation Service, for some reason or other, is dissatisfied with further negotiations and further transactions with reference to the matter with the water users' association, and insists that hereafter it will deal only, so far as it can help itself, with the district organization, and insists that before this appropriation has its approval the district organization should be effected.

Now, I am utterly at a loss to understand the contention that this provision predetermines anything whatever in the lawsuit. The lawsuit will go on just the same as before, and the amount which the water users' association is required to pay will, of course, be determined. It is simply a question, as it seems to me, as to the reasonableness of the contention now made by the Reclamation Service that hereafter it will not, unless Congress requires it, deal with the water users' association, but will insist upon an irrigation district organization. If I am in error about this, I should be very glad to be corrected by the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The proviso is inserted at the earnest insistence of the department. It seems to believe—and I think correctly—that it would help to effectuate their purpose. It desires, in other words, to withhold any appropriation from these people until they shall have formed this irrigation district. One of the things that these people contend that they do not desire to do and will not do is to form an irrigation district until the terms of the agreement which the district is asked to sign shall have been agreed upon and the amount of it shall have been disposed of between the representatives of the water users' association and the Government. If the conference report is agreed to, with the proviso that no amount of the appropriation shall be used for drainage until they shall have formed the district and shall have executed this contract, of course it is a powerful club in the hands of the department to compel them to come to their terms. It is an attempt to withhold what they are entitled to have, to wit, drainage, until they agree to something which the users claim to be unjust. All this takes place in an appropriation bill. I know how anxious you all are to pass these supply bills and how difficult it is to delay them, but certainly we ought not to do a wrong to these people, even under such urgent conditions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am unable to follow the Senator at all. We will say the district organization is effected and it agrees to pay the actual cost——

Mr. BORAH. But the department will not let them do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If after the irrigation district is formed the Reclamation Service declines to enter into a fair and reasonable agreement with them, then they would, of course, appeal to Congress and the appropriation would be made accordingly.

Mr. BORAH. I know, but the Senator does not take into consideration—and he knows, of course, quite as well as the Senator from Idaho—that it is a considerable task to organize an irrigation district for the purpose of effectuating a contract or concluding a contract, and then if it turns out that the contract is not acceptable to the district they have a large amount of expenses on their hands for nothing.

If the Senator will pardon me, they have asked the department, as I am informed, time and time again to submit to them the contract which they will be asked to sign in case the district is formed. I am also informed that the department has declined to do this. Although the contract is withheld, so I am informed, nevertheless the department asks that all drainage and all protection to these people by the Government be withheld until they form the district and sign this contract, the terms of which they do not know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, it occurs to me that the position taken by the local users is a very reasonable one and that they should know beforehand what kind of a contract they are expected to enter into after they effect their organization. If it should appear here that that is the situation of affairs and that they have asked the Reclamation Service to designate the kind of contract that they will be expected to enter into when they do organize, and the Reclamation Service declines even to intimate to them what kind of contract they will have to sign, I should say this is an unreasonable provision.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I quoted at some length from the resolutions recently adopted by the water users' association, in which it was stated, the Senator will remember, among other things, that they had frequently requested that they be advised as to the character of contract they would be called upon to enter into with the Government in the event they complied with the wishes of the Director of the Reclamation Service and organized an irrigation district, and that as a matter of fact a copy of such contract has not at any time been presented to them. I will read a telegram which is dated at Caldwell, Idaho, May 21, and is as follows:

CALDWELL, IDAHO, May 21, 1920.

HON. J. F. NUGENT,
Washington, D. C.:

Whereas a bill having been passed by the lower House of Congress appropriating a sum of money for drainage in the Boise Valley, the said bill now being before the Senate for consideration; and

Whereas a provision of the bill being to the effect that the appropriation shall not be available to the Boise project until an irrigation district shall have been formed; and

Whereas a mass meeting having been called to consider the advisability of so organizing: Be it

Resolved, That we, the settlers under the Boise project, in mass meeting assembled, hereby reaffirm our desire to promote harmonious cooperation between the Reclamation Service and ourselves and concerning the formation of an irrigation district we invite the Reclamation Service to submit a copy of the contract which we would be required to execute under such an organization.

L. J. MAGEE, Secretary.

It appears not only from this telegram but from the resolutions which I have read that requests have been made in the past and are now made by the water users for a copy of the contract, which they will be urged to execute in the event they organize an irrigation district, and that it has never been presented to them.

I believe that the Senator from Montana desires to be entirely fair in this matter, and I again call his attention to the fact that the rights of the people on the Boise project became established in 1906, when, at the request of the then Secretary of the Interior, they organized a water-users' association and entered into a contract with the Government, which was executed by all parties concerned. Now, it is sought, indirectly, if you please, to deprive them by this proviso of certain of those rights and without affording them an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is why I rose, because I am utterly unable to see that it has that effect, nor how it is going to operate to affect that legislation in the slightest degree.

Mr. NUGENT. I am not familiar with the provisions of the contract, but I assume that the difficulty that has arisen between the Reclamation Service and the settlers' association relates to the construction to be placed on certain sections of the contract. The dispute has been submitted to a court for settlement. It does seem to me that, notwithstanding the pending litigation, the settlers should not be deprived of an appropriation for the purpose of drainage or for any other purpose connected with the reclamation work on the ipse dixit of one man.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, everybody will agree to that, but that is not the proposition. Here is the amendment:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation—

That is, the $774,000—

shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws and upon the execution of agreements for the repayment to the United States of the costs thereof.

That is to say, for reimbursement to the United States of this $774,000, or so much thereof as shall be expended in connection with irrigation. That is the condition. The costs of the reclamation project are in controversy in the lawsuit, and that lawsuit will go on just exactly the same. The proviso does not affect that contract in any way whatever, but simply provides that this appropriation of $774,000 shall not be available for irrigation unless an irrigation district shall be formed, which irrigation district shall enter into the contract with the United States, not to pay the whole cost of the irrigation project—that is already taken care of by the water-users' contract—but to repay the $774,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana is in error.

Mr. NUGENT. Then the Senator's contention is that it matters not what the legal rights of those settlers may be under their contract, the Congress can deprive them of those rights by refusing to appropriate money for reclamation purposes?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. It simply provides that the money we now appropriate, $774,000, can not be made available unless an irrigation district is formed, which irrigation district will agree to pay not the costs already incurred but to pay back the $774,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana could separate expenditures heretofore incurred in the building of the project from the appropriation of $774,000 and have in mind the proposition of organizing a district merely to take care of the $774,000, of course, he would be entirely correct; but, entering into the question of the organization of the district, as to whether the people will vote to organize a district, whether or not they can act intelligently at all, they must have before them the contract which the district is to sign, and that contract must cover not only the items of expense under the appropriation of $774,000, but the contract must also cover the items of expense which are involved in all previous relationships between the settlers on the project and the Reclamation Service.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that is not what the law says.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon; that is what it says in its practical workings. It is that—

No part of this appropriation shall be expended for drainage except in irrigation districts formed under State laws.

In other words, they can not get any part of this drainage money until they organize a district, and they can not organize a district in the State until they know the terms of the contract, and that contract must include all previous expenses as well as the $774,000.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is where the Senator from Idaho and I differ as to the language of the bill. It provides not that the irrigation district shall be required to pay the cost of the entire reclamation project, but the "costs thereof"; that is to say, to reimburse the $774,000.

Mr. BORAH. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will go to the telephone and call up Mr. Davis, who is doubtless the author of the language, I will venture to say that he will not contend for a moment that he is asking for the organization of the district to make sure the repayment of the $774,000, but he is asking for the organization of a district which will enter into an agreement for the repayment of all costs which have been assessed against that entire project from its original inception to the present day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Idaho will understand, of course, that I am desirous of voting with him on this matter; I am desirous of accommodating my views to those of the Senators from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that exactly, and the Senator and I do not disagree upon the law at all. We simply disagree upon the facts, which facts construe the law in this instance, and necessarily so.

Now, let us bear in mind that under no possible conditions can the Government lose one dollar by this transaction that it ought to have. Even if the $774,000, or any of it, is utilized for drainage prior to the organization of an irrigation district, nevertheless every dollar of it is just as secure as if it were a first mortgage upon all that land, because the water users' association, already formed, and the respective farmers, with their individual responsibility, are liable for every dollar that is expended for drainage or anything else. Therefore, the Government can not lose a dollar.

I have no doubt the House conferees honestly thought that without the formation of the irrigation district there would be no security for the $774,000. That assumption probably arose from the fact that they were not entirely familiar with the operations of an irrigation district; but, as a matter of fact, every dollar of it is perfectly well secured, because the liability is there in another form. The department, however, requires that before the amount be expended the liability be placed in a different form, to wit, by the organization of an irrigation district instead of a water users' association.

The organization of the irrigation district involves, if there is to be intelligent action upon the part of the people, knowledge of what their contract is to be. The knowledge of that contract, they say, is withheld from them, so that they can not even proceed intelligently to cast their votes in favor of an irrigation district, because they do not know what it will be. Nevertheless, they are asked to proceed to organize an irrigation district without knowledge, and when it is organized, then the contract will be presented to them in such form and including such amounts as the department sees fit to suggest; in other words, the people are asked to vote for a district the obligations of which they do not know before they vote.

What is the object of the proviso? The object of the proviso is to withhold the drainage that is necessary and essential and which they will need until they comply with the demands of the Reclamation Service and organize a district, and do so without knowledge of the terms of the contract. That is the object of the proviso. It is not necessarily to affect the litigation but to drive them into the organization of an irrigation district before they can get relief from the extra flow of water upon their lands, which relief is very necessary for their purposes. In other words, they have got to do without drainage until they organize a district, and they have got to organize a district regardless of whether the contract suits them or not, and they have got to organize it regardless of whether they know the contents of the contract. That is the manner in which judgment is being passed upon these people.

I say again that I must believe that the House did not understand that every dollar of this money is perfectly secure.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the measure which we are considering is the sundry civil appropriation bill, which provides very largely for running the Government during the next fiscal year. We are now under the shadow of a proposed adjournment. The bill covers some 200 pages, and there were 126 differences for the conferees to adjust.

When the bill originally came to the Appropriations Committee from the House it received at the hands of the Senate committee very urgent and continued attention. We took up everything that was offered, heard everyone who wished to be heard, and came on to the floor of the Senate with the bill. Of course, those not especially interested received their first knowledge from the terms of the bill as it was being read; I can understand that; and there is nothing more natural in the world than that the Senator from Idaho should offer the amendment, with his view of the case, which is doubtless correct; and there is nothing more reasonable, I think, than that the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill should accept the amendment, as it related to an Idaho matter, and was presented by an Idaho Senator. This incident, however, proves, I think better than almost anything else, the danger of legislating on the floor and placing amendments in a bill which the chairman or the committee has had no opportunity to investigate because of the lack of time. The amendment went in the bill with no one knowing of the circumstances of the case except as they appeared here.

The original provision coming as it did from the House, where the two Idaho Representatives are very active, it was natural to assume that the provision was satisfactory to them or else they had overlooked its significance. However, the Senate struck out the House provision and the bill went to conference, where the Senate conferees met with very decided resistance. In the meantime, the only information we have been able to obtain has been from the Reclamation Service, which seemed to think the House provision was all right, and from statements of Members of the other House. Now in the very last moment of the session we are met with this difference, which I regret exceedingly, because I know that Senators in States where irrigation projects are located are the best authority we can have in such matters; but here is a condition confronting us.

When I say it is impossible, it is impossible in all reason to say that we can amend it now. Of course we can destroy the bill; we can vote against the conference report and send it back, and on account of the time that it would take for a further struggle with opposing elements and enrollment and the signatures of the presiding officers and all of that we probably would lose the bill. On the other hand, I may say without any secrecy about it that we met with the most determined resistance to this amendment on the part of the House conferees, and we did not receive any help from any Members of the House to maintain our amendment as it was offered and accepted in the Senate. It was one of the very last matters to be settled in conference, and I regretted very much, as I know my colleagues did, that we were compelled to recede in part, and, as we thought, to better it somewhat by the additional language.

I wish to assure the Senators from Idaho that if the matter were not in this extremity I should certainly offer to cooperate with them in obtaining in some substantial way a reconsideration; but I regret to say that it is now simply a matter of taking it as it is or losing the bill, this particular appropriation and all the others in it.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, there are three days of the session remaining; and I fail to appreciate the reason why, in the event this conference report is rejected, another conference can not be had and the matter amicably adjusted in the three days. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that that course be taken.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, my sympathies were with the Senator, but I say to him that it can not be done at this hour. There is too much to be done. In fact, the men who are conferees on this bill have other bills following this one, so that their time is occupied; but, even if they met, the fact that we send the bill back does not take from the other side any of their steadfastness in regard to this amendment. They get no contradiction other than from us here on this side of the Capitol concerning this amendment.

I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I realize, as the chairman of the committee [Mr. WARREN] has said, that the shadow of adjournment is hanging over the Congress. It is rather a fog of adjournment. Everything that is being done now is being done blindly, apparently. I should like to vote for this conference report, because I entertain the hope that there is something in it that is founded upon reason and not upon haste. I have not found it yet, but I am sure it is there somewhere.

A case like that cited by the Senator from Idaho appeals very strongly to western men who know something about irrigation. I can very readily conceive that it is a matter of no importance whatever to the great majority of the Congress. I conceive, however, that it is of importance to the whole country. It is one of the chief sources to which we must look in the future for the production of food.

The methods used in the legislation to which the Senator from Idaho refers constitute the same character of coercion that was used to force the water-power companies to submit to a voluntary and revocable permit under the Forestry Service. They would drive a little wedge of a forest reserve across a line of ditch or power, and then they would say, "You have got to cease work unless you accept a revocable permit under such terms as we want." This legislation is intended to accomplish the same thing; that is all. They say, "You do not have to take this money for drainage unless you want to." They know they have to take it. Then they attach terms to it which these people do not want; that is all. It is a method of coercion. I am referring, of course, to the matter affecting Idaho.

Now, I want to turn to another matter. I refer to amendments numbered 62 and 63, on page 109 of the bill, under the title "Reclamation Service." The Government has expended over $10,000,000 on the Newlands project in Nevada. They have taken that money and they have dumped $10,000,000 worth of water on a flat country, and then they have not spent a cent to drain it off. They have not spent anything to drain it off, because Congress will not give them the money. Congress is in the shadow of adjournment. Congress is in the shadow of a convention which is apparently of more importance than any legislation for the West. That is the truth about the thing.

I do not blame Congress for knowing nothing about irrigation. I would not blame the conference committee for not knowing anything about the Newlands project, except that it was argued on this floor before it went to conference. We tried with all of the information we had to convince the members of the conference committee on the part of the Senate that drainage is as essential to irrigation as placing water on the ground. I am satisfied that the members of this committee from the West ought to have understood that. The Reclamation Service made an estimate of $300,000 to drain the Newlands project. They stated that the land was being swamped with water; that a project that had cost the Government over $10,000,000 was being destroyed for the lack of drainage; that the Government was losing money upon its investment by reason of the failure to appropriate this insignificant sum by comparison with the great investment that had been made; yet, in spite of that estimate, and in spite of that assurance by the Reclamation Service, in spite of the pleas by the 10,000 people who live on that project, this conference committee treat this matter as cavalierly as they would treat some foreign question.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have no desire to object to any pleasure that the Senator may get from alluding to the conferees in that manner; but I assure him that when men go into conference they go in to compose the differences between the two bodies, and I have never yet seen the time when the conferees of the Senate could obtain for every single Senator everything that he desired, not even the Senator from Nevada. The conferees did their duty, and did it, I think, as well as conferees usually do, and stuck to every one of their additions here in the way of amendments as long as it seemed as if there was a chance of winning.

The Senator certainly must know that in a bill of this size, and with this number of amendments, some of them have to be yielded; and the Senator knows, as I told him the other day, that every single project mentioned here had estimates of twice or nearly twice as much as we gave them, because there is not enough money to give the full amount, and the law protects the money that there is by providing that it must be divided equally.

The Senator knows, although he skips it in his remarks, that that large statement or computation was made upon the expectation of this free oil money, or that we should borrow $5,000,000, which we have not done, and the oil money is not yet free, so that that talk about the estimate being more than the appropriation cuts no figure whatever unless you should prefer that one project as against all the others, and take the money that belongs to others for that one.

Mr. PITTMAN. Why did the conference committee strike out the word "drainage"?

Mr. WARREN. For two reasons. In the first place, the House insisted that it should go out. In the next place, the Senator knows—or if he does not know he can find out by inquiring—that while in making up an estimate they may put in drainage at so much, and reservoirs at so much, as a matter of fact they can use that amount for drainage or they can use it for the other purpose, as they have done in the other States. There is no question about that.

Mr. PITTMAN. It did not do any harm in the provision, then, if that is the case, did it?

Mr. WARREN. It did not.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a difference of opinion among lawyers, the Senator understands, as to whether the word "drainage" is necessary or not.

Mr. WARREN. There was no difference of opinion on the part of the conferees of the Senate that would cause them not to stand by it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Nevada, since he has spoken of this matter as having been treated cavalierly, that I am not a western man and know very little about western matters and reclamation. I find, however, that the western Senators do not always agree. When they do agree, they will find me agreeing with them; but when they differ about these matters I have to exercise my best judgment, and I generally listen to the heads of the great departments of the Government who investigate these matters and are expected to know all about them.

The views of the head of a department whose business it is to watch over these things are what really govern me when the western men differ, and they do not always agree. If they agree, they will find me agreeing with them. Therefore the Senator must appreciate the fact that there has to be some way for me to make up my mind, and in such cases it seems to me that the best thing for me to do is to go to the head of the department.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear the Senator say that, because I know now how he stood on the conference committee, because the head of the department stood for these amendments that I introduced, and in fact recommended them before they were adopted, and every western Senator stood for them. Therefore, there is no question about where the Senator from North Carolina stood; but I realize that the Senator from North Carolina would have no very powerful control over that conference committee, or any other conference committee, under the shadow that has been spoken of. There is a shadow on this Congress and has been for some time, that has obstructed all common-sense reasonable legislation.

I know well enough that things are being jammed through here because Senators and Members of the House of Representatives are seeking to go to a political convention. I do not blame them. It is a matter of great interest. It is a matter of importance to them; but there is no reason why legislation vital to the interests of this country should be sacrificed by reason of any of those desires or political ambitions. So far as I am concerned, there is not any three days left at all; there is an illimitable number of years left to stand here and legislate properly on this matter. I will not vote for a conference report so made up.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, do I understand that there is no significance to be attached to the action of the Senate conferees in receding from the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and adopted by the Senate, in regard to the drainage on the Newlands project?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator asks if there is any significance about it. First the objection came, and we were not able to overcome it. It stood separate and apart from the raising of the appropriation—that is, we treated it separately—and the House would not consent to it. On the other hand, the Senate conferees knew, as I know and as the Senator, I think, knows, that that money could be expended whether that was in it or not; so they felt more comfortable about that, naturally, than they would about cutting down the amount of money to be expended.

The conferees, like every Senate conferee that acts his part conscientiously, undertook to maintain exactly what the Senate instructed them to maintain; and although the chairman of a committee or Members may say on the floor that they object to the incorporation in the bill of an amendment, and may vote against it, when the Senate has voted to put in the amendment the conferees, so far as I know, never fail to sustain that amendment on its merits, exactly as they do the others.

The word "drainage," as I have stated, was objected to because it was a distinguishment that was not carried in the other cases, and, as they believed, because it was a dangerous precedent to make to affect the belief or in any way insinuate that it was possible that we had to take up the divisions of drainage and irrigation and specify in each case how much should go to drainage and how much should go to irrigation, because, since we are giving them the sum, it is to be presumed that the department and also the settlers will decide among themselves what amount of it should go first to drainage and what amount should go to the other purpose.

In my own case, whatever may be the observation about western Senators, I have been here some time and I am from the West, and I recall that I was chairman of the joint committee of 17 which brought in the original bill that was afterwards passed and that created this whole system of Government irrigation. I take no particular pride in it, because it was imperfect, but my first efforts in the United States Senate were along the lines of irrigation and reclamation, and I have spent 40 years, the best years of my life, in assisting in building up our system of reclamation and irrigation.
